Homework...

Home work is still required by students attending Catholic schools. Some parents object lest their children wear out their eyes or their brains...

The importance of home work is that it is in that endeavor a pupil learns how to study. This is more important for future life than most of the facts gleaned in the childhood study.

Here is where the parent comes in as educator. The parent, by patient and kindly interest in the child's study problem, can teach the child how to study...

Some parents become impatient with their children and condemn home work, because they find some of the studies even in the grammar grades difficult, particularly in arithmetic...

The important parental teaching is by example. If the atmosphere of the home is studious, the child will adapt himself or herself to the quiet hours of the evening...

Some homes have a book. It is used for interior decoration. It was brought at the same time as the over-stuffed furniture and the living room table...
