Getting On In The World

SUCH IS NOT LIFE

This world of ours, with all its drawbacks, its sorrows, and its wars, has still a great deal of brightness, and joy in it. Just as its sadness and misery are very much of our own making so the cheer and happiness is of our own looking and doing. We can develop a gloomy habit of looking at the dark side of things and closing our eyes to the bright. Or we can make the best of what is unpleasant, and the most of what is encouraging. To grouch and see all black is to give oneself a nasty, deformed picture of everything, to which one points and groans: "Such is life." No, my pessimistic friend; such is not life. The true picture must be painted with all the colors, the bright as well as the dark, the sunny as well as the stormy, and the latter only in due proportion. Misfortune brought on ourselves by imprudence of a kind does not necessarily tell against the happiness we have in our power to create within and about us. No one can close his eyes to the wrecked homes and lives suggested by our penitentiaries, hospitals and asylums. No one can make a joke of the terrible wars that lay low the whole of the human race and degrade it beyond years of recovery. But withal, a trust in God, the Redeeming Babe, and a confidence in ourselves not only to carry on but also to suffer as well, will order everything in true perspective and create a brightness and joy that nothing on earth will ever slay.

SAVING AND SPENDING

By LUCIA MALLORY

Issued by the National Kindergarten Association, 8 West 10th Street, New York City. These articles are appearing weekly in our columns.

"Don't these dollars look big, Mother?" My niece, Alice Mallory, held up two dollar bills for her mother's inspection.

"They look very nice, Alice," my sister-in-law replied. "I'm glad you have an opportunity to earn some money this summer."

"I'm taking care of little Bobby Stanton on Wednesdays and Saturdays, Aunt Lucia," my niece explained. I had just arrived for a visit in my brother's home.

"Shall I get some new tennis balls or put all of this week's wages into the bank?" Alice asked, turning to her mother.

"Haven't you been planning to buy new tennis balls ever since Mrs. Stanton told you she wanted you to take care of Bobby this summer?" her mother asked.

"Yes," Alice replied. "I just wondered if I ought to spend that much money on myself. Maybe I ought to save all of it."

"You can buy three tennis balls with half of your money," her mother counseled. "and then you can put the other half into your savings account. That would be a fair division."

"All right, Mother!" Alice's eyes were shining. "I'll go downtown right now and get my tennis balls and put one dollar into the bank! If Kenneth has time this evening, we can play a set before dark."

"You've made a good point there, Harriet," I said to my sister-in-law after Alice had gone. "I believe every child should handle his own money and learn how to spend and how to save it."

"I want Alice to have a sense of achievement that will make her work worth while. Nothing will give her that more than purchasing a few desirable things for herself with money that she has earned by her own efforts. Putting a part of each week's wages in her savings account will keep her from spending too freely. A savings account is not a very tangible thing to a fifteen-year-old, yet both Alice and Kenneth have become greatly interested in building funds to help themselves through college."

"Do you know, Harriet," I said, smiling at my sister-in-law, "that I think my niece and nephew have very wise parents?"

"You'd better say that those parents profit by their own mistakes," Harriet replied. "We did not know so much about the need for teaching children how to handle money when Kenneth started his paper route."

"At first he was a proud young business man, handing each week's earnings over to his daddy to be placed in the bank. "It wasn't long, however, before the boy's interest began to lag. He made no effort to extend his route or to increase his earnings. We soon realized that our son wasn't getting much satisfaction from his work. "Ned decided to try letting Kenneth take his own money to the bank. That made his earnings seem more real to him, but it wasn't until he had made a few purchases with his own money that his interest was really aroused. "Kenneth wanted some attachments for his bicycle and Ned suggested that he buy them for himself. He began to make purchases for the rest of the family, too, little things that he saw we needed, a tea strainer for me, a key ring for his daddy and a school notebook for Alice. Eater on he bought a good Kodak for himself. "Now Kenneth has built up a fine paper route and he has a good income for a boy of his age. I am sure," Harriet concluded, "that nothing gives a child such a sense
