Robert was manifestly troubled. "Young children are often jeal-ous," Mother and Daddy had some-times remarked, "but he'll soon get over that and love his little brother as much as the rest of us do."

Occasionally, they made a special offort to pet and make much of Robert, for they did not want him to feel pushed aside or neglected. As time went on, he became interested in Baby Tony, often playing with him and being amused by his cute little ways,

When the time came for Robert to go to school, he seemed to have no difficulty in getting along with the other children, but for some reason or other, he was listless and inclined to daydream.

One of his teachers reported to his mother that Robert did not appear to be entimusastic about anything, nor to be able to concentrate. She suggested that it might be well to have the child checked over physically by a competent over physically by a competent physician.

Robert had been an only child for nearly four years. Then his new brother Tony arrived and took the center of the stage.

At first relatives and sometimes occasional, callers teased Robert about having his "nose put out of joint" because so much attention was being given to the baby.

Tobert year apparentled.

From this point on, Robert's parents definitely changed their tactics, Very soon the child was sleeping better, taking more interest in his meals, and was decidedly happing in his chool about having his "nose put out of joint" because so much attention was being given to the baby.

We aften are emirided that the teacher reported that he was mak-ing much better progress in school and was plainly enjoying it. We often are reminded that the

It is thought that shortly the older child will become accustomed to the new member of the family and make the best of the latention.

But this attitude is entirely wrong. The older child should, from the first, not be obliged to endure but be helped to enjoy the little, stranger. It should be his laby—needing his love and care. Then, he will be glad to share with him. It will please him that his mother and father too. Instead of suffering a feeling of loss and final care.
