Feminists Would Destroy Home

mothers' babies in defense areas we would heartily welcome the construction of dormitories near the plants for the thousands of unemployed men of our large cities. The employment of married women and especially mothers, disrupts our entire social order." Even in Wartime

Similar thoughts are contained in the pastor letter of the Bishops of England. "The rearing and education of children," it states, "remains above all the duty of the parents, for it is impossible for anything else to replace the natural, affectionate, individual relation of parent and child." Even in wartime, we would add.

Considerations of this kind, the extreme feminists conveniently overlook. As also the fact that a woman today can engage in virtually any occupation she chooses, as was the case even in the Middle Ages, except those for which she is unsuited by nature. The tearing down of protective safeguards established around women, as the equal rights' advocates would do, would bring great harm to our country. And neither can the social dislocations caused by the presence of women, especially young mothers, in war plants and factories while men are still unemployed resulting in the breakdown of family life, be looked upon without alarm. The feminists are having their inning at the present time but they and the country with them, will have to pay a big price for this folly in the future. Women assuredly have a place in the war effort but that place is not the one assigned to them by either the feminists or false friends.
