

Absence of Spiritual Ideals Retards Peace — Archbishop Mooney

DETROIT—That we can "have a peace that is based on the codification of the natural law and leaves the field open in democratic freedom for the development of the super-natural principles of Christianity"

Catholic Daughters Events Scheduled

The forty-fourth annual meeting of the Catholic Daughters of America, Court St. RMs was given as follows: "The Sacrifice of the Mass and Our Lord's Sacrifice," Miss Jane Wipier, "Why Each Church is Crowned with a Cross," Mrs. Victor Carocci, "The Athanasian Creed," Mrs. Thomas Malone.

A St. Patrick's Day Supper is planned for March 16 in the court rooms, with Mrs. Harry Elias, Mrs. William Helleman and Anale Pittin in charge of arrangements. A card party open to the public, will follow. The money realized will be given to the Red Cross.

A rummage sale will be held Thursday, Friday and Saturday of this week on East Water St. near Lake. Mrs. J. F. Harshman will be assisted by Mrs. Walker Sullivan, Mrs. Edward Frawley and Mrs. Francis Doran.

A Victory Dinner in May will take the place of the annual formal banquet held by the CDA. The money saved by making such a change will be used to buy War Stamps and Bonds at the dinner. Mr. Harry Elias, vice grand regent, will direct the affair.

"The United States are true to their original and historic mission of the United States," Archbishop Mooney, Archbishop of Detroit.

The Archbishop in an address delivered at the regional meeting of Catholic College Students discussed the question of ever attaining "a real and lasting peace in justice and liberty to all nations."

The problem posed a practical question in his address, "what chance is there that we shall get a Christian peace and a Christian world order out of this war?" He recalled that President Roosevelt in December, 1941, said that, "in victory we shall seek not vengeance but the establishment of a world order in which the spirit of Christ will rule the hearing of men and nations."

Archbishop Mooney frankly admitted that the outlook was doubtful. "We can give what we have not given," he said. "Because to many of the countries that go to make up the roster of the United Nations, as nations, do not explicitly recognize the super-natural ideals of Christianity, the possibility of international peace becomes an uncertain issue."

"On the other hand," the Archbishop recalled, because "the majority of the United Nations and above all the strongest of these, possess moral, Christian principles of government" that is strong hope that we can have a durable peace among nations.

Archbishop Mooney concluded his address by reminding his audience that "real peace is within the range of practical achievement, if we keep faith with those who die."

War is terrible! Why we actually have to do without a dress or so things we never had back in 1918.

WITHIN REACH

By LUCIA MALLOY

Israel by the National Kindergarten Association, 8 West 46th St., New York City. These articles are appearing weekly in our columns.

"I've been trying for seven years to teach Sammy to hang up his clothes, but he still leaves some of them around on chairs!"

Mary Denton moved about her living room in an embarrassed manner gathering up her son's coat, cup and mittens as she spoke. "I suppose I should call him down here and have him take care of them," she continued, "but I hate to nag him all the time, and I do not like to mention his shortcomings to him in the presence of guests."

"You are right about that," I agreed.

"Sammy is a fine lad," added Ellen Marshall.

We had come to our friend's home that afternoon to attend a committee meeting. While we were talking, Mary opened a closet door to hang up her son's clothing. I noticed that all of the hooks in that closet were high. Not one of them was within reach of a seven-year-old's short arms.

"Does Sammy always keep his clothes in that closet?" I inquired.

"Yes, that's where we all keep our outdoor things," Mary answered. "Of course he has a closet in his own room."

"Doesn't he have to stand on tip-toe to reach the clothes hooks?" I asked.

Mary turned back to the closet with some astonishment. She lifted her hand to the height of the hooks and measured the distance to the floor with her eyes. "Why, Lucie!" she exclaimed. "These hooks are pretty high for a small boy! I've never thought about that. Do you suppose that could be the reason he hates to put his things away?"

"That could easily be the reason," I replied. "I might not have noticed your closet if I had not stopped at Nancy Harter's yesterday. Her little daughter, Joan, was showing me a new sweater her mother had knitted for her. When she took it out of the closet to show me, I noticed that several hooks were placed so low that a six-year-old girl could easily reach them."

"The fittings in Sammy's closet are adjusted to his height," Mary said. "It hadn't occurred to his father or to me that he needed a corner of his own in the family clothes closet. Well, let it up for him right now."

A few weeks later I met Mary Denton on the street.

"You ought to see how Sammy takes care of his clothes now, Lucie!" she exclaimed. "Since his father placed some low hooks in the closet for him, he actually likes to hang up his things! I'm grateful to you for your suggestion."

"We've learned to put things within reach of the children in their room at the nursery where I work," I replied. "We have low book shelves, little chairs and tables and low beds for the card catalogue. Even the pictures are hung lower than they would be for adults."

"The children are always comfortable in your room at the nursery," my friend declared. "I think most parents provide small chairs and tables for their children. I wish some of them realized that the problem of teaching children to take care of their belongings would be more easily solved if shelves and drawers and clothes hooks were placed so that the boys and girls could easily reach them."
