Women Working For Victory

"Today the big news in America is this: Women are working for victory! To our brave armies of fighting men we add the women who first helped release them for combat duty, and who now are helping them to maintain and win their fight... the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps." Mrs. Officer Helen J. Caudrey, WAAC of Federal Bldg., said today in explaining the purpose and the work of the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps.

"This is a war in which women can and must take part. The fight for democracy is total, America's women as well as her men must now do their part. There are many opportunities for women in the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps. There is interesting work that women can do as well as, and sometimes better than, men.

Through the WAAC women can find the place where their skill and knowledge will be of most use in the war. After a five-week basic training period, the WAAC assigns women to non-combatant duties in the army, where they can release men for combat duty. Lieutenant Crantree said. Some of the duties for which the Army needs WAACs are those: typewriter operators, telephone and telegraph operators, radio operators and repairmen, secretaries and clerks, cooks, chauffeurs, automobile mechanics, and many others. Promotion is dependent upon demonstrated ability, and the opportunity to become officers through the WAAC officer candidate schools is open to all.

Aviation Cadet Harold F. McAvoy, 21, son of Mr. and Mrs. Harold A. McAvoy, 129 Flower City Park, is attending New York University's college of engineering where he is studying a course in meteorology under the direction of the Army Air Forces Technical Training Command. On completion of his course this summer, McAvoy will be commissioned a second lieutenant in the Army Air Forces.

Requirements for the military weather forecasting course are extremely high, calling for at least two years of college work including mathematics and physics. McAvoy attended St. Michael's College, Toronto, from 1933 to 1942.

Graduates of the advanced meteorology course, which is also taught at other selected universities throughout the country, will give vital weather information to pilots of the Army Air Forces. On the accuracy of that information may depend the success of a combat mission and the safe return of airplanes and their crews.

Before his enlistment in August, he was in the stock department of the Eastman Kodak Company.
