WHERE ARE THIS MONTH'S BILLS?

"Speaking of money," Father said, "where are this month's bills?"

"Gone," Uncle replied. "I've been looking for the household accounts with your money."

Fred Vinnik, who was the only son of How Fetherman, was sitting at the table one evening. He had just finished his dinner and was looking at the bills on the table. He wouldn't move them. "The bills are gone," he said.

Father was a fairly good "Vinnik" he used to say, "this is a matter of dollars and cents and that's something you don't have anything about." But he knew about it. And he would have appreciated the fact that while the money of most things have been going up, the average price of electricity has been coming down. The fact that the average family has more gas than in such a long time for its money today is a good thing.

Being a practical man, Father would have heard the reason why. As he used to say to Vinnik, "You know I like to live well, and I want my family to live well. But this business of the rent is a business plan."

And then, mostly last year, the price of gas fell. On a Sunday night.
