Talkies Talk too Much And Say too Little

By WILLIAM M. MOORING
One critic wrote that adding talk to motion pictures was "like putting a brass tail on a bronze bull." That was twenty years ago. I had never seen a bronze bull at the time and for that matter I still haven't. I did, however, see the first full length talkie turned out by the Warner Brothers in 1928 and from it I saw that talkies had a chance to stay.

My first experience of a picture with a dialogue was with the picture "The Jazz Singer." It had been shown in New York some months earlier and most of the British film critics were ready to agree with those in Manhattan who had declared the hybrid art a passing fad. People they insisted, enjoyed motion pictures for the very reason that their absence left nothing to be desired. With "free wings" audiences could watch a show and fill in individual ideas of what this character really said to that one.

I never saw it that way, but went overboard in support of the new type movie. I even took bets from other London critics that talkies would banish silent films from the screen. If I had collected I might have started film production on my own.

As it was I stuck to prognosticating and poking my nose into everything filmic. I said among other things that greatest danger arising from the use of dialogue in movies would probably prove to be that the movies, like most people, would talk too much and say too little. My guess was right. Talkies did talk too much and say too little—and although there was vast improvement during the first five years of audible film manufacture, it seems to me there has been very little, if any, during the past fifteen years.

For one thing the talkies paid too well. It did not matter what rubbishy stories film producers turned out, they always made some profit. That was good for Hollywood; good and bad. Nothing is more deadening than easy success and the 20th anniversary of the coming of sound films coincides with financial reports showing that major film companies like Warner, Paramount, RKO-Radio, 20th Century-Fox and MGM have doubled or even tripled their earnings over the past year. Paramount, for instance, netted $22,000,000 the first half of 1948!

Of course, they all forget the end of the picnic. They know that the death of OPA, price inflation and industrial retrenchment will hit the box office before very long. Darryl Zanuck sounded a warning when he called this week for "a return to old-fashioned showmanship." It needs courage to suggest anything "old fashioned" in Hollywood where the dizzy search is always for something new.

More Fruit in Good
Zanuck meant that solid ideas profitable to earlier film showmen should not be rejected by those of today. The history of talking pictures shows clearly that in times of national poverty and depression, theaters packed in the most money with shows that made people feel happier and better after they'd seen them.

If Hollywood producers go back through the financial records of the past 20 years they will find that although movies dealing with criminal violence, domestic upheaval, divorce, dishonesty, and moral laxity, often made profits, they always returned less than those in which good character, family loyalty, happy marriage, straightforward dealings and high morals were shown as the golden keys to human happiness and lasting achievement.
