Mid-Year Exams Are Like Retreats—for Mom

My MARY TINLEY DALY

Mid-year exams are like time, their books, sometimes studying and tide. And like time and with tears streaming down cheeks: "Why we've never even tide, they are mot by each perhad this and here it is on the review sheet!" Of course, son at our house accord. they've had it! ing to his tmdividual temperment.

They get up hollow eyed and littery and pray furiously The builetin board of the stove in filled with petitions for prayers at particular hours, the air is thick with promises of reform.

It's hard to have patience with such lack of forestacht, such entering to the whims of in class and fixed out that, all in the moment; but now that all, less time is consumed in they're in the mess, all I can study, worry and panic For do is what they've asked: pray them exams are perhaps not a and hope for the best. I glasse at the white part of the stove and see in big letters; 9 m.m. ARITHMETIC! A ROSARY PLEASE! (Arithmetic is something this particular petitioner never gets around to at hornework (ime.)

Daily Times and the Catholic itself, mildyear exams came to as the smints did. Wonder if any the unprepared and to the bluf saint ever counted rosary decades on slove burners?

The rosary is finished bethink of other neglected duties pushed saide in favor of making interesting garments; the kitchen closet that gets more cluttered, though there's tirme to polink the plane; stop-an visits at church that could be made on the way to the greeery store - except that "I'm in a hurry this time," yet not too much of a hurry to stop for a prolonged conversation with a friend outside the store; the serious book that gathers dust while light magawines are read from cover to torium at their disposal the stu naid: the notes of apprecimtion that should be written, yet every time I all down to the deale I write a long, gabing letter to my sinter. . . .

And I'm the one who did the preaching, extolling day by-day adherence to duty -- even disagreeable duty - to backsliders in the scholastic department at our house!

In a way, midyear exams are not only like time and tide, they're a little like a retreat or a mission.

City Desk

A forwant salute to the Catholic Press from this city desk, as we approach Catholic Press Month. Without the C.P. our appeals would be a voice in the wilderness. Without the C.P. the homeland and the mission lands would be two worlds. They are linked together by the C.P. which effects an exchange of knowledge and aid in a bond of Charity. May our Catholic Press be blessed with enduring success and increasing vitality.
