Army Newspaper Lauds Priest War-Correspondent

Hq. Eighth Army, Korea — (NC) — The Rev. Patrick O'Connor, of the N.C.W.C. News Service, has been paid a tribute in the Pacific edition of Stars and Stripes, service newspaper, as the only Catholic priest who is also an accredited war correspondent in Korea.

"FOLLOWING A recent Catholic service at the Seoul Cathedral, the priest removed his vestments and revealed the white and blue patch of a United Nations War correspondent," Stars and Stripes said.

The article related how Father O'Connor had said Mass that morning to a small congregation of 14 people, eight children and six old people, two of whom were blind. It pointed out that the Columban Father had been covering the religious aspect of the Korea war from both the soldier and civilian's viewpoints since last October.

"AS A WAR correspondent," the Stars and Stripes article went on, "he is often up with frontline troops and holds service and hears Confessions from men who have missed their duties with regular unit chaplains."

Wearing a regular Army uniform, the article says, Father O'Connor often finds GI's confused when they look at the correspondent's patch and then at the little silver cross he wears on the collar.

"Who Are They Trying To Kid?" Critic Asks

Robert Rossen (family named Rosen) directed "The Brave Bulls" but failed to emulate them. He was not brave enough to "come clean" before the Un-American Activities Committee.

W. H. Mooring

He said he was not a member of the Communist Party when he mounted the witness stand but refused to tell whether he had been a member the day before.

He declared under oath that he was not, at that moment, a communist nor in sympathy with communist party aims, but he would neither deny nor confirm that he once held card number 25111 in the Northwest Section of Los Angeles Communist Party.

In effect all he said was that as and while speaking under oath he was neither a commie nor a sympathizer. What had gone before, like what might follow, he kept to himself. Let us remember that.

If Rossen, and others commit themselves only to a pledge of loyalty for the present, they not only fail legally to commit themselves regarding their political past but their political future also.

As long as the attitude is "I am not a communist at this moment but I stand on my constitutional right not to declare whether I was a communist a moment before I was sworn," they may claim they are innocent of perjury even if it eventually transpires that they again became communists a moment after they stepped down from the witness stand.

CLEARLY THE stand taken by Robert Rossen and J. Edward Bromberg, who also refused to say whether he at various times held Communist Party cards 25093, 48971, 41776 and 47347, invites the conclusion that they are not anxious to clean their slates.

When in 1950, the New York critics and the Hollywood Academy acclaimed Rossen's "All the King's Men" as the film of the year, this column referred to Rossen's political record and declared that the "Huey Long film (it was plainly his story), if taken as fair comment upon the American political scene, will win no prizes for Americanism." "All the King's Men" was here summed up as "fascinating after the fashion of a snake."

Rossen's graduation from snakes to "Brave Bulls" coincides with the public disclosure of the red rag.

He now says he is contemplating going to Mexico to produce pictures because they can be made more cheaply there.

It will be an excellent idea if no Hollywood studio stands in his way and an even better one if every American theater owner decides to grant Mexico exclusive booking rights to all Rossen's films unless and until he "comes clean."

Bromberg already has left Hollywood, which is none the poorer for his absence.

Both men, by the way, are anything but a credit to their race or their country.

• • •

WHILE WE ARE looking back please recall that this column, on several occasions, pointed out that the Party-liners in Hollywood were anxious to promote more and more films dealing with various phases of Nazi or Fascist dictatorship.

The idea, I insisted, was to divert public attention from the more ominous threat of Communist dictatorship. The schemers played upon Hollywood's natural antagonism to the Nazis, in order to further this particular plan.

Robert Rossen's "All the King's Men" was just such a picture. John Garfield, John Huston and Peter Viertel in 1948-49 did "We Were Strangers," a similar story ostensibly dealing with the Machado regime in Cuba, during the early '30s.

This was described here at the time as "revolting and mischievous." I further suggested that the objectives of the independent company responsible invited official investigation.

The executives of Columbia Pictures who consented to distribute both these films, now declare they are aware of dangers they did not perceive at the time. Yet this column had begun as early as 1943, to expose indirect methods by which procommunists were innoculating as many motion pictures as they could get to work on.

Does anyone in Hollywood seriously believe they will now give up their intentions?

The suspects should be watched and the guilty weeded out for good.

Spanish Prelates Urge State Act Against Inflation

Madrid — (NC) — Spain's Archbishops have called on the government, business and consumers to work together to curb inflation in a joint pastoral published a few weeks after strikes against the high cost of living took place in Barcelona, Pamploma, Madrid and other cities.

The main function of government is to promote the common good and in this task the first step must be to provide the people with the basic necessities of life, the Archbishops said.

"The State," they declared, "should see to it that (1) there is enough work for all those who make their living with their hands, (2) essential foodstuffs do not become scarce, and (3) prices be within reach of the working people who live on a fixed salary.

Although a merchant should receive some profit as an incentive to his business, the Archbishops went on, "an injustice that cries to the heavens for revenge is that some seek to exploit the shortage of goods to amass huge profits by selling well above the just price, bleeding those in need."
