Rochester Nun-Nurse Helps Treat 1,000 Koreans Daily

Helping to care for 1,000 Korean refugees daily at the Maryknoll Sisters clinic in Pusan, Korea, is Sister Mary Magdalena, nee Catherine Urliacher, of Rochester, a nurse.

"The Rochester nun is working with six other Maryknoll Sisters and Sister Mary Mercy, the former Elizabeth Hirschbach of Milwaukee, a physician.

THE HEARTBREAKING plight of the Korean refugees as realized by the Maryknoll sisters is told in a letter from Sister Mary Mercy to Maryknoll headquarters.

"There are 400 people out there," the letter said. "The patients start lining up at 2 in the afternoon," the letter said, "prepared to sleep on the street all night and get into the morning to get into the dispensary for their heartbreak to see their children who are lined up at the foot of our stairway, all the way to the main street."

The American nun from a medical team headed by two doctors and three nurses. They were among the first civilians allowed to re-enter Korea and since last March have been operating in make-shift quarters made partly from packing cases. The Sisters are assisted by several doctors and nurses from the Army hospital at Pusan.

"I have someone look over the crowd for me," Sister Mary Mercy's letter continues. "To see

A Tribute To Sr. Dosithea

A tribute to the late Sister M. Dosithea form one of her former pupils at Saint Ambrose School.

She wore the habit of Joseph for forty three fruitful years.

Her labors in the classroom brought young souls very near.

Her years at Saint Ambrose were many, her "merry sunshine" greeting still stays.

Her life was an example of kindness, her mission on earth is fulfilled.

And now she has gone from the vineyard to the place where souls are so still.

May the Angels rejoice at your coming, and greet you, dear Sister, today.

With the beautiful salutation, "Well done, faithful servant, come this way."

Balancing The Books Lean Meat On Articulated Bones

By Rev. John S. Kennedy

Helen Caldwell Day was born black and is a born writer. Read her extraordinarily moving autobiography.

Color, Ebony, and you will probably agree that it is among the most engrossing and inspiring life stories you have ever taken up.

Her chief interest is in the count of the coming of faith and the Path to an American Negro with a background hardly disposing her to Catholicism. But only second to that is the fascination to be felt as a gifted and disciplined artist with words turns quite commonplace material into pages which pulse and enthrall from start to finish.

Mrs. Day's father was a learned man who held professorships in various colleges, her mother was a religious woman with no absolute certainty as to doctrine. The family was poor, and that in addition to their being colored made for a nervous and distressful existence. Vividly indeed the 23-year-old author indicates what it means to feel the sting of discrimination for the first time to become aware of the narrow and repressive boundaries arbitrarily set about one's existence because of an accident of pigmentation.

She was a spirited child, not taking kindly to the crippling limitations which fate imposed on her. Always she boasted that she would go her own way, get her own way, do great things, defeat the taboos.

She had a religion of sorts, but this was ever shifting, and when finally she began college, it was diluted almost out of existence. During the war she went to New York to train as a cadet student nurse at Harlem Hospital. She was on the verge of discovering and embracing the true religion.

THIS BEGAN by her observation of, and reflection on, life and death. Both were everyday occurrences in that, as in every hospital. Sometimes even in Catholic hospitals, one is shocked and puzzled by the breezy indifference to the meaning of both which seems to prevail; the perfunctory pseudo-professional callousness in the face of tremendous and never-stalling miseries. But here was a sketchily instructed girl, in a non-Catholic hospital, meditating as she went about her work.

In pediatrics and obstetrics classes she was taught that she must baptize all unbaptized infants of Catholic parents if the little ones were in danger of death. The first time she performed this, to her strange duty, she felt sad and bitter about the child's quick passage. But then, the rite over and the child gone to God, she felt a fierce pride and joy, as if he were my own creation of love.

It was then that I first began to realize that death need not be terrible at all but could be a bridge to Heaven, to God.

Her ideal was still a decent life, according to ethical principles but without dogmatic and liturgical religion. Yet the longer she was in the hospital, the more she saw of the frailty and the desperate needs of unassisted human nature. And she perceived "how easily the laws we make for ourselves degenerate, noble though we may be, when we exclude God from them."

She had a few days of enforced leisure, during which she reviewed and summed up her life. And it was after this examination that she began to take instructions from a Catholic priest. When she was baptized she wondered whether the babies she had baptized hadn't done a great deal to bring her to the font of life.

THERE FOLLOWED a few days, illness which cut short her hospital training, a marriage which turned out badly, difficulty in staying alive and making a living, a threat of polo hanging over her son. But it all deepened her appreciation of the Faith, the omnipotent truth and power of which came home to her in adversity.

Later she joined the Catholic Worker group, of which she writes discerningly. She tells too, of joining the varied but uniformly delightful group at St. Michael's, an Oriental Catholic church in New York; of her mother's conversion; of an interracial group in Memphis which, on a solidly Catholic basis, appears to be doing something substantial and enduring toward bridging the wholly artificial and cruelly wounding gap between black and white.

MRS. DAY'S BOOK is brief, but it is all lean meat on admirably articulated bones. As a study of conversion, it has its own character. As a picture of the spiritual and inimitably appealing personality of a young woman, it is graphic without being sensational and it is constructive in its indication of how Catholicism can heal a scandalous wound.

AS A rehearsal of the exorcism of its meanings, a denudation of our religion, an exploration of its workability, it is remarkable. An altogether exceptional work, this must be on your reading list for the fall and winter.

Non-Catholic GI In Korea Asks Nun's Aid

Appreciating the unselfish work of the Maryknoll Sisters at Pusan, Korea among whom is Sister Catherine Urliacher of Rochester, Private Frank Thomas Lane, a non-Catholic, has sent an appeal to a friend in Geneseo for assistance for the nun.

The young soldier who is a chaplain's assistant has written to his Geneseo friend telling the story of the Sisters and of their caring for upwards of 1,000 persons a day.

"I think it would be wonderful if I'm sure God would bless you if you could interest people you know or even don't know to send something to the fine Sisters here," he writes. The address is Maryknoll Sisters, Pusan, Korea.

His friend, Miss Joanne D'Aprile, 939 West Lake Road, Geneseo, N. Y., is eager to help in the work collecting articles for the orphans and the sick in Pusan. She asks if anyone is sending such articles to get in touch with her or she will accept old clothes, medical supplies, toys and other articles for the Sisters.

AMONG WOMEN

Be Yourself

By MARY LENNON SNYDER

In my teaching days there used to be included in the English course of study an entertaining essay entitled "Ever Man's Natural Desire to Be Somebody Else." I used to feel that the finer points of the wit and satire were lost on my teenage students because one needs a background of bership ready to serve whenever asked.

The other officers must be equally careful. No officer should or under a carefully written constitution legally could make independent decisions regarding organization policies. Each woman before agreeing to accept nomination to a given office should read carefully every word in the constitution, particularly those affecting her projected rights and duties.

THE OTHER POINT in the essay, the narrowing of interests for efficiency, contains good advice for every officer. If you are a secretary, be a good one but don't think you carry the responsibility of the whole executive committee on your shoulders. If you are president, remember that you are an officer not to remake the organization according to your own ideas but to carry out the will of the members.

If each officer and member would remember to avoid the temptation of being someone else and do only the job assigned to her, we could save time and energy for better purposes than the unwinding the tangled skeins of a mismanaged organization.
