Blanshardites Search In Vain

By Rev. John S. Kennedy

Some wonder why I was a... I was a... I was a...

Perhaps those critics of the Church whose vocal cords are sturdier than their scruples expect to make prejudicial hay of the work's circulation.

He had a breakdown, went to Switzerland to recuperate, and while in a sanitarium there, came to the conclusion that the human mind is a paltry thing.

He did not turn to any form of Protestantism or to any other religion as, in his view, a religion that has even the least form of the reasoned statement of truth, is false and frustrating to the soul.

THE BLANSHARDITES will search this volume in vain for ammunition. Monastic living is, he says, immensely beneficial to those who enter upon it and to the world at large.

Moreover, the author states that priests, far from having closed minds, are required to search deeply practically every phase of human knowledge and experience.

There are, however, factual errors. For example, it is untrue that the Index applies only to lay people; that the new code of Canon Law was not completed until "many years" after the death of Pius X.

It is only the so-called rationalists who would maintain that reason exhausts the knowable. The true mystic goes beyond reason, not against it.

The AUTHOR ALSO insists that there is no such thing as the human personality properly understood. The "I," he holds, is a noxious invention of that devilish deceiver, reason.

There is a sad story, but its sting is for those who picture the Church as the enemy of reason.

WHAT'S DOING AT THE DALYS'

Full Circle Again

By MARY TINLEY DALY

"We're down to four, so we're going out to eat!" Ginny announced to our next door neighbor.

"Four what?" Carolyn Fallon asked. "Is there something I could lend you?"

"Four people," Ginny explained. "We always go out when we're down to four" (This is the first time it has happened in Ginny's lifetime).

So we ate out once and loved it—though, Markie, I weighed the advantage of no dishes to wash against the disadvantage of "no seconds." That week of being down to four was peaceful, no denying it, and the work seemed down to a minimum.

Then began the fun of preparing for the returning travellers: cleaning rooms, painting a bookcase and making new curtains as a surprise—putting on fresh sheets and dresser as a treat.

"I wasn't a bit homesick," Mary declared with a strange-hoed hug. "But gee, it sure is fun to be home. Everything looks so different—and so good."

Over lemonade and cookies everybody told the story of summer adventures and we stayed up even past adult bedtime, planning a long sleep Saturday morning.

Geneva Miss Marie Petrosino was flower girl and Ronald DeMatties, cousin of the bride acted as ring bearer.

Sunday morning we all went to Mass and Communion together for a real thanksgiving. There was a quiet sense of joy that one can't put into words.

the telephone was tied up all afternoon with giggling confabs—and a religious program on the downstairs radio conflicted with a comedy program in Eileen's room and a swing session in Mary's.

There wasn't a drop of hot water left after all the shampoos—white shoes dried on the window sills, young people trekked in and out all day, the supplies of ice cubes, lemons and cookies were exhausted.

After Pat, Johnny and Eileen left for the evening and Markie went next door to baby sit, we four remaining sat on the porch, drawing sweaters around our shoulders against the chill of the evening.

"Well—we're down to four again," Ginny suggested hopefully. "Not really," Mary said, rocking back and forth. "And I think eight's better anyway, don't you?"

"Full circle's the better, no matter which the number." We rocked in unison.

Give Them Hope "At our age it would be hopeless to start again," said a middle-aged woman and her husband swept out of the house by the Kansas flood.

It is more than a year since we met the man's young overseas wife who was a nurse from London. She is now in the Red Cross and help them build a new home.
