Hollywood In Focus

By WILLIAM H. MOORING

Anyone Can Make a Movie - But One Need Not See It

Gary Cooper won an Academy Oscar for his heroic "Sergeant York" and established himself as a solid American when he went to Washington as an anti-Communist witness before the Un-American Activities Committee.

Foreman had just been bought out of the Stanley Kramer production company for whom he wrote such screenplays as "Champion" and "Home of the Brave."

Foreman had testified that he was not then a Communist; that he had not been a Communist a year earlier, but for reasons best known to himself, refused to answer the simple question, "Were you ever a member of the Communist Party?"

THE MOTION Picture Industry Council, which embodies all the major Hollywood trade and professional organizations, had gone on record as "having no sympathy with witnesses who stand on the First and Fifth Amendments; who refuse to give their complete repudiation of Communism and demonstrate their loyalty to our country."

Abide, however, from the merits of Carl Foreman's case, the fact that Gary Cooper's name was put forward as an associate with Foreman in a film production enterprise and that Lippert Productions, Inc. was to distribute the resultant film, tended to change the whole climate of Hollywood opinion as to the value and meaning of attitudes taken by certain movie people during the recent investigations and policies to be followed in dealing with them.

Neither Robert Lippert, nor his associate Murry Lerner (also associated with the Lerner Shops) had any comment to make when I called them.

I. H. Prinzmetal, attorney and business manager for Gary Cooper, told me, however, that there is not and has not been any legal contract between Carl Foreman and Gary Cooper to form this company; that the matter was discussed between them and that Cooper may have been disposed to invest something in the proposed Carl Foreman Productions, Inc., but that as I write, "Gary Cooper is not involved, nor will he become involved."
