DOINGS AT THE DALY'S
By Mary Tinley Daly

"Wish I were getting ready to do it. That's fine!" Standing on the pier, feet wide apart, Ginny held onto the rod for dear life, an eight-inch fish flapping about at the end of the line, splashing her blue shorts with sea water.

"Look, Ginny," the Head of the House grabbed the fish. "Now this is the way you unhook him. Put your hand over his fins, take the hook out of his mouth — like this. Want to try?"

"Oh NO!" Ginny put her hands over her eyes. "The poor little thing. He was so happy there a minute ago in the water with his friends. Can't we throw him back?"

"We'll throw back the little fellows, but not a nice fat fish like this. He's led his life. It's the way people get food. God gives us fish to eat, just as He gives us meat and eggs and vegetables."

THROUGH THE hot afternoon the fishing session went on and with every rebaiting Ginny spat upon the bait — and had remarkably good luck.

Sitting on the pier, straw hats protecting eyes and faces from the sun, the skin on arms and legs of the two fishermen became ever pinker. Every now and then, one of the other would get a bite, appraise the size of the fish, consult as to whether or not to throw it back.

Finally, we saw the tall and the short Isaac Waltons trudging back to the cottage, poles over shoulders, sharing the weight of the bucket of fish.

"I caught TEN!" Ginny exclaimed. "And Daddy only caught twelve and he's been fishing for forty years. He told me so. It's fun."

Cleaning 22 fish is no small chore but the head that he is, the chief of the Head of the House. Plenty of newspapers, a sharp and jagged knife, and running water were all he asked. Ginny helped for a while. "Yikes," she sighed as she resigned. "It's bad enough to unhook 'em — but to chop their heads off!"

Matter of fact, Ginny didn't eat any of the catch that first Friday night. She settled for a couple of eggs. The rest of us, though, went to town on the delicious fresh fish. "I know it's silly," she smiled ruefully, "but my life long I've eaten fish Mom bought in the store — and somebody caught them — but you gotta get used to this."

GINNY AND the Head of the House had many a session of fishing in their "Places Club" as they called it. They even inveigled the author of this column into trying, unsuccessfully, to approach their record. The few bites I did get however — nearly all of them the kind that had to be thrown back — gave a slight taste of the thrill.

Back in the city a few days later, we met a friend of ours, a Bishop, eligible by inclination for the "Places Club."

"Did you have a nice vacation. Your Excellency?" we asked. "Fine," he said, "except that I caught only one fish."

Ginny nudged us in the ribs. "One's better'n none," she grinned. "But did you go?"

"Did you have good weather?" we interrupted.

"NEXT SUMMER," Ginny said as we drove home, "before the Bishop starts on his vacation, I think we oughta tell him about the boys on Chesapeake Bay. One fish!"

Knowing the Bishop, we shall tell him the "trick." He may get a good laugh.
