Family Together

By Mary Lennon Snyder

ily recreation is taken together. Since all are sports enthusiasts, the entire family makes a weekly trip, whenever possible, to see one of the vicinity high schools' seasonal athletic contests.

SUMMED UP, the family has a sense of togetherness. They all get up early, work together, or separately, for the common good, and then have their good times together. The parents do not seem burdened by righteousness. They do not seem to imply they are doing this because they should. Somehow one gets the feeling that they would rather be working and playing together with their children than doing anything else in this world.

This togetherness, an underlying cause of a recent family mishap, has been severely tested within the past few weeks. While ice skating with the boys on the farm pond a few weeks ago, the mother fell and broke her right wrist. She has been able to continue her outside work but her efficiency as a housekeeper has been seriously affected.

In this time of family crisis the responsibilities and confidence accorded the boys have borne fruit. When a few weeks ago the schools in this area were closed for two days because of weather conditions, two of the boys happily spent their days housecleaning the kitchen while the other two found extra work around the barn. The kitchen crew concluded by waxing and polishing the kitchen floor.

OF COURSE, there are humorous complications; for instance, the nine year old, in a burst of culinary ambition, made oatmeal cookies but by mistake substituted cornmeal for oatmeal. The report is that the cookies were different, delicious — and none went to waste.

As I write this I find myself smiling at several anecdotes concerning the boys crowd to my fingertips, eager to be set into print. However, I think I have presented an adequate picture to support my opening statement. Here indeed is a refreshing picture of four happy boys brought up by responsible parents to be responsible children.

Nor has it been all work. Family recreation is taken together. Since all are sports enthusiasts, the entire family makes a weekly trip, whenever possible, to see one of the vicinity high schools' seasonal athletic contests.
