'Very Few' Reject Census Question On Religion

Washington—(NC)—The U.S. Census Bureau said here "very few persons" refused to answer a question on religious affiliation included for testing purposes in a recent nationwide survey.

The bureau is now weighing the pros and cons of including such a question in the 1960 population and housing census. The recent test was designed to gauge reaction to the query which opponents have claimed to be widely resisted.

A. W. VonSTRUVE, chief of the information office at the bureau, said exact figures on the response to the question are not yet available. However, he explained that "a general observation" of the bureau's enumerators is that there was "very little bad reaction." He said it appears "there was less reaction to that question than to some others we have introduced in the past few years, such as the question on income."

The religious affiliation question was asked in March of persons over 14 in some 35,000 households across the country. It was included in the monthly questionnaire which determines employment figures.

Those opposed to inclusion of the question on the 1960 census have argued that the query will be resented as an "invasion of privacy" and as interference by the government in a church activity.

SEVERAL CHURCH-related groups, including the Catholic Press Association and the National Council of Catholic Men, have urged the question be asked, stating that it will aid the churches in their future planning and assist scholars in their study.
