'Folks Stop To Stare' At Nuns In Carolina

Robbins, N. C. — (NC) — When a group of Glenmary Sisters came to town here they had about the same effect that a horse and buggy would have in most any big city today. The folks stopped and stared — they'd never seen a Catholic nun before.

THE SISTERS came here to conduct a summer school of religion. They stopped their auto and asked directions of a group of girls. But all the girls could do was gape.

Finally one nun asked if the girls would like her to get out of the car to see how she was dressed.

"Oh, please do," said one youngster. The Sister complied and the girl asked: "Would you wait so I can get my mama? She's never seen anything like you either."

The Sisters waited and the girl came back with her mother, obviously slightly embarrassed but too curious to stay at home.

Next day the Sisters, unable to get any children to attend the religion classes, came into town and met some high school girls. The Sisters joined the girls in a baseball game. That evening a number of the girls came to the religion class. One girl told the nuns:

"I just didn't know what you were, where you were from or if you were real until you played some ball with us."

In one North Carolina town the ice is broken although some still turn their heads as a Sister goes by. But now folks know who they are. And in other North Carolina towns, someday folks will stop and stare wide-eyed — when the first Catholic nuns come to town.

Church, Home Rituals Seen 'Heart Of Faith'

Montreal — (NC) — Family life demands the widespread use of the Church's liturgy in the Catholic home, Msgr. Irving A. DeBlanc told delegates at a week-long International Catholic Child Bureau Congress here.

MSGR. DeBLANC, director of the Family Life Bureau of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, Washington, D. C., said the liturgy is not an accessory to be used, or not used, in the home according to choice.

It is, instead, "at the heart of our faith," he said before the
