At Our House . . .
From The Shoulder

By MARY TINLEY DALY

It was a Sunday in winter. One of those rather spiritless Sundays in a long, dull winter, everybody at our house was more, rather than less, out of sorts.

Somebody had taken somebody else's misal, somebody could find only two left rubber boots. "And if we don't take off right now, we're all going to be late for Mass!"

"I'm ready, you're the one that always makes us late."

Delightful beginning for participation in the Holy Sacrifice.

"Bet there'll be two collections," from a grumpy back-seat passenger.

"But maybe no sermon," from another.

In mood matching the take-off, we shuffled into a crowded auditorium where a "second" Mass was being celebrated in our overflow parish.

THE DIALOGUE Mass cast its spell. In answering the familiar phrases, some of our irritation of the early morning was erased. After the Epistle and Gospel, a young preacher — unknown to us — came to the pulpit. Calmly and unemotionally, as though talking face to face with each one of us, he preached his sermon.

Its subject? Spiritual growth. He spoke, of course, of the saving of one's soul — the supreme end of man — and the necessity of being in the state of grace.

Evidently out of a thoughtful experience, though it could not be too long because of his youth, he said, "You go back to confession week after week, month after month, carrying the same discouraging tale. Same old story — you've gone and done it again."

There is the feeling that, try as you will, you are making no progress toward spiritual growth.

Along about then we, in our separate places in church, had the same reaction (as we compared notes afterwards). It matched the mood of the morning. Consensus: we're getting nowhere.

"There is no measuring stick," the young priest went on. (Quotes are simply from memory) "All along our lives we have been tested and measured. We go through school, take a certain amount of work and then are examined as to how much we have assimilated. In our spiritual lives, we seek such a measuring stick. We have progressed or we have retrogressed. That is not possible in this sphere. There is no measuring rod."

HE THEN mentioned how much sorrow we have evidenced for sinking back to "the same old story" told in confession. Also, how have we prayed? Has it been a sincere, "Lord, I've made a fool of myself all over again. Please forgive." How deep is our sorrow for sin? Is it ever deepening? If so, that is progress.

We may think we are going ahead spiritually, for a time, the preacher said, then back we slough into the same old habits, whatever they are, that stunt our spiritual growth. Disheartened, we wonder how we can ever progress.

Though there is no definite measuring stick, or test, he told us, there is this encouraging thought:

For the week ahead, if you can resist temptation — whatever it is — resolve that you will do it. Don't blow your top. Don't listen and take part in sinful or uncharitable conversations. HOLD THAT LINE!

It was a different family which one by one returned to the car at the close of Mass. No talk of second collection, having to stand during Mass or of the day's future plans.

First remark from family member, with concurrence from all: How's about that for a sermon! Say, that preacher is terrific!

We have no idea who the young preacher may be, but may he continue his apostolate.

It was a Sunday in winter that we hope we shall remember.
