World-Wide Speakers Here

Three international speakers on the Nazareth College program this week. Beginning with Rabbi Ira Eisenstein's speech on Monday on "Israel's Relations with the New Nations," the attention of the colleges was focused on messages from international lecturers.

An internationally-known authority on the relationship of physical education to personality development, Dr. A. Paplunskas Ramunas spoke at Nazareth College auditorium on Wednesday evening. Subject of his lecture was "Living, Learning and Earning."

Dr. Ramunas, Director of Comparative Education and Professor of Education at the Graduate School of Psychology and Education, University of Ottawa, is the author of "Education of the Whole Man through Physical Education." The book was widely acclaimed as a major contribution to the study of the relationship of physical education to the development of the whole man. Dr. Ramunas is also Consultant of the International Review of Education, published by UNESCO.

Yesterday at 4 o'clock, Mr.

Notre Dame Evaluated

Notre Dame High School was evaluated this week by the Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. Using the materials and procedure developed by the National Study of Secondary School Evaluation, the commission will report its findings to the school next fall. If satisfactory, the school will be declared a member of the Middle States Association.

Son of God

By SISTER MARGARET TERESA
Nazareth College

Jesus Christ, by Leonce de Grandmaison. Preface by Jean Daniélou, S.J. Sheed '61. 266 pp. $4.50.

Time Magazine for April 14 highlighted in its Religion column the French theologian Oscar Cullman's "form-criticism" study of Christ's divinity, and his conclusion: Jesus enjoyed a "complete and unique oneness with God which he experienced continually and in a manner beyond all human possibilities."

It was a reminder of the fact that many earnest persons live their whole Christian life unresolved of this point, or committed to the rejection of His divinity, seeing Him only as "the prophet of God's love and of human fraternity."

Drawn to the amazing power, moral beauty, integration and mastery of two worlds that Christ at every word and act reveals, they conventionally, habitually refuse to hear Him say He is God. That which alone truly accounts for Him, as Pere Daniélou points out, they reject.

Timely, therefore, is this reprint of the heart of Pere Grandmaison's 1930 three-volume study of Jesus: it is "form-criticism" with a vengeance, linking the Gospel wording to oral tradition, presenting the witness of Jesus himself in its totality, the "entire direction" of His life and all His claims—following this with the witness of the first generation (and putting out of court the notion that imaginative exegesis shaped the doctrine of His divinity)—concluding with the witness of later history, the writings of saints and lovers of Christ down to the present.

It is timely also because Pere Grandmaison saw the powerful beginnings of the ecumenical movement when he was writing, and was concerned to support those men who saw the true basis of union: God's Will to "unite under one head, in Christ, all things that are in heaven and on earth." In the beautiful final chapter the author strains to put into the hearts of his readers the healing truth: "A long and intimate acquaintance with the sayings and actions of Jesus, as they are related to us by those who were witnesses from the beginning and the servants of the Word, is the only means by which a man can make Christ's message real to himself.

All the labors of the specialists cannot clear a way for him to the fountain head, once he has reached it, let him kneel down and quench his thirst: "It is indeed hunger and thirst for God that are in some obscure way tormenting a generation repelled by the barrenness of rationalism. . . . Let that generation return to the living waters of the Gospel."

But this portrait of Christ for us too, both for the apostle because of its quiet reasonings reconstituting again and again the image of our peace, and for our personal growth in Him. To know Him: to hear the unmistakable mastery and fatherhood and re-creating and all-demanding love in those wonderful phrases of His—this is renewal of life for every member of the total Christ.

Commentary On The First Man In Space

Was he really first?
Was this son of a carpenter really first in space?
I think not.
There was, once, another Son. Son of a Nazareth carpenter. Who was sent into space.
The first manned flight was into the illimitable human heart.
The second thrust went into orbit
From the launching pad at Calvary.
The duration of actual flight: Three hours.
The impact on the world powers:
Infinite!
