'King and I' To Be Staged

Barbara Flanagan, Rochester actress who has achieved stardom in Ohio musical theater circles, will return to her home town to sing the lead in "The King and I."

The Rodgers and Hammerstein classic based on the novel, "Anna and the King of Siam," will be staged in Eastman Theater by Rochester Music Theater as the annual benefit show for the Firemen's Benevolent Association. Performances will be on two successive weekends, Sept. 14-16 and 21-23.

Miss Flanagan has just ended a summer season with the Cleveland Playhouse where she played leads in the first out-of-New York productions of "Little Mary Sunshine" and "Royal Gambit." She will return to Cleveland for the winter season after her "King and I" appearances here.

OPPOSITE HER AS the irascible monarch will be Ron Pedrone who scored a sensational hit in Music Theater's production of "King and I" a couple years ago. He sang the male lead of Billy Bigelow in "Carousel," last fall's Benevolent Fund show. A graduate of Ithaca College Drama Department, Pedrone is now in theatrical stock.

Co-directors of Music Theater Sue Wigg and Noreen Carey Bride also announced that they have signed Dick Latessa, seen this summer with Town and Country Musicals in East Rochester, for the role of Lun Tha. This is the young romantic whose bitter-sweet love affair with Tuptim, the pretty Burmese princess of the Siamese court, threads through the plot.

In the Tuptim role will be Betty Stoller, an Eastman voice major studying for her master's who has had wide theatrical experience in summer stock in the East.

Anna Piacentini as Lady Thiang, the king's first wife and Bill Baller as the Kralahome, adviser to the king, complete the featured acting singing cast.

Tickets for performances are now available at all city fire houses.

At Our House . . .

Back To School

By MARY TINLEY DALY

Store windows are full of "back to school" clothes, perked up with backdrop of gay college pennants. Store ads fill the newspapers, luring parents to "see that your child is as well dressed as his classmates." Even banks and insurance companies get into the act with pictures of a baby wearing a mortarboard, and the dire warning, "When he is ready for this hat, will you see that he gets it? Make your plans now, by regular monthly payments."

Everyone, it seems, has become higher-education oriented, ever since Sputnik roared aloft nearly five years ago bringing America face to face with the fact that it had been jogging along, education-wise, in more or less the same old pattern. Our engineers and scientists at that time were unable to perform a like feat. Now, the space twins of Russia have again demonstrated superiority in technical know-how, with the chain reaction on American education that our teaching of science, mathematics and engineering, while greatly improved, must be further stepped up, and quickly.

STATESMEN, economists, and the man in the street look to the educators of America. Answering the challenge, the educators have given a comprehensive examination to their system, from kindergarten through graduate school. They found, for example, that until recently, European children were learning in eight years what it was taking American children of comparable ability of 12 years to learn.

So, in the past four years great strides have been made. In one Maryland county, it was found that a physics course designed for college freshmen and high school seniors could be taught in the ninth grade. In a Virginia county, math students in high school now know as much as a math major did formerly in his junior year of college. At the Catholic University of America, it is now possible for students to earn a doctorate in a period of two or three years less than previously.

High schools are inaugurating special non-credit seminars for students able and anxious to broaden and deepen their field of knowledge; high school groups this past summer took part in many varied fields of research on university campuses. Selected high school teachers of math and of chemistry received intensive training in modern methods of teaching their specialties, at Catholic University and other institutions.

The study of languages, and with laboratory facilities to intensify the learning process, has permeated even the grade schools. Experimental schools are proving that children want to learn, and can learn even at an early age subjects considered "beyond" them.

One such school is the Amidon Elementary School in Washington where an educational experiment has been going on for the past two years and declared successful by Dr. Carl Hansen, District superintendent of schools.

The Amidon children begin grammar in the fourth grade and Spanish in the third. They are taught concepts of geometry beginning in kindergarten, along with phonics to help them read better. There also is instruction in speech and composition including choral reading and memorization of poetry in every grade.

Educational television is playing its part in enriching the school curriculum; teaching children at an early age to use library facilities is doing the same.

On the other hand, the alarming drop-out of high school students is presenting a problem.

According to President Kennedy, "In this country today we have one million boys and girls out of school — out of work. In the last eight years of this decade, according to some predictions, we are going to have eight million boys and girls who are going to leave school before they finish and they are going to be around looking for work."

REASONS for the drop-out are many and varied: dissatisfaction with school, the hope of getting a high paying job, the trend toward early marriage, parental pressures.

As parents, there is much we can do to keep these boys and girls in school and to make education a meaningful experience for them. But it can't be done by inertia.

An appreciation of education, conveyed more by attitude than by lecturing is highly important. So, too, is understanding the individual child. If one child in the family is an A student without half trying and his brother knocks himself out to make a C, parents are making a mistake to pressure the low man to "be like your brother and make the honor role."

There is something for everybody in this educational system. Parents are wise if they help each child to achieve his own potential.

As one successful educator recalls his own struggle up the academic ladder:

"I was in the third of the class that made the top two-thirds possible!"

Separate Classification

King of Kings—While acknowledging the inspirational intent of this picture, the poetic license taken in the development of the life of Christ renders the film theologically, historically and scripturally inaccurate.

Walk on the Wild Side—This film is a melodrama developed in the sordid context of a brothel. Although the theme (redemption of a prostitute) is moral, numerous elements of treatment require caution for a mass audience.
