Freshmen In The Fall

By MARY TIMLEY DALY

To paraphrase: Oh, to be a freshman now that fall is here! Perhaps our consciousness of the particular fleeting phases of life is accentuated because we have a freshman in our own family, added to the fact that our daily tasks take us to the campus of a large university where other freshmen are being oriented to college life.

"Please, Ma'am," a bewildered, book-laden, sports-jacketed young man asks, "Could you tell me where the French II assignments are posted? I'm a freshman," he explains, as though that were necessary.

We steer him in the right direction.

A pair of girls in the curtain department: "Are you sure, Sue, that you really like these? You're not just saying so because you want to be an agreeable roommate?"

A COUPLE in the cafeteria: "I'm from the west. Seems a million miles away... No, I'm not really homesick, not really. Know what I mean?"

"Yeah, And these trees — all gold and red, mighty pretty. Makes me think of how it must look at home along about now. Ever been to Connecticut?"

The crowd of youngsters on hand before the post office opens, waiting for the mail to be distributed.

"I've written to everybody I know back home — folks, teachers, even my kid brother."

"Me too, using all my money on stamps!"

And from our own freshman, daily letters, gradually changing from "Guess I'll get used to this place and the assignments are tough. It really love it here!" At that stage, the letters dwindle in number.

There is more news about school activities, funny jokes that happen on her way to the forum, less and less curiosity about doings at home — except for inquiries about Magoo ("Sure wish they'd let dogs in here!")

'Tis the voice of the freshman abroad in the land.

Boys and girls of the Class of '67 don't realize it now, but these first weeks and months will be etched indelibly into their lifetime memories.

For a long time, the smell of fresh paint will be associated with memories of the new dorm they moved into; the somewhat anonymous taste of food cooked in wholesale quantities will remind them of eating with hundreds of others; the feel of crisp October air, sight of leaves drifting from brightly colored trees will renew that "beginning fresh" sense; willing help from teachers, smiling greetings from bewigged friends will later be cause for reminiscences of "When we first came to this place."

THERE IS AN enormous awareness of every experience, minor or major, for these young people as they embark on their first taste of independent living. An awareness that will in the normal course of events, be blunted even when they begin their next transition, into the "wide, wide world."

For 17 or 18 years, they have been emerging from the realm
