Marathon '33

By EUPHEMIA WYATT

MARATHON '33: The terrible part of it is that during the great depression of the '30's, couples entered a dance maze because they were actually hungry or homeless and it meant food and a roof for weeks if they were allowed only ten minutes sleep an hour which is four hours sleep in 24 hours. Miss Hays has played her own experience with a marathon and called it a play but which is really representative of another marathon in meticulous reproduction.

That it has tempted the talent of Julie Harris has given it an importance it doesn't warrant as drama. Of course Miss Harris plays the adolescent June supremely well but to permit one of our best actresses to consume so much time and physical effort in a reproduction of a play which is a work of art is a pity.

It is Miss Hays who makes an attempt to infuse any drama into her production.

"Baby June" has just run away from the chronic infamy to which her mother's vanity and she had condemned her and was looking for a job as an entertainer when she wandered into the marathon. She was a girl who had been carrying paper bags and boxes she knew it, she was linked in partnership to the official comedian who was hired to brighten things up for the audience and spectators.

Once she had started, she was not to stop, even though she was to be a girl who had been carrying paper bags and boxes she knew it, she was linked in partnership to the official comedian who was hired to brighten things up for the audience and spectators.
