The Eyes Have It

By MARY TINGLE DALY

Time was when no lady worthy of the name left her home without being properly batten and glued.

Nowadays, she is gloved and glazed—with sun glasses of varying hues, always.

Seldom is she hatted, even for church, thanks to those blessedly cool, almost universally carried out the injunction (attributed to St. Paul, I believe) that a woman's head must be covered in church. The significance is not as flattering, perhaps, as is the mantilla, but let's not go into that!

TODAY, SPECTACLES have become de rigueur for every woman with even the slightest inclination to keep up with fashion, regardless of time of day, season of year, condition of weather.

Purely functional a few years ago, worn to screen out the glare of summer sun and winter snows and to retard onset of wrinkles occasioned therefrom, sunglasses were, like umbrellas, used only as we needed them, abandoned completely when indoors.

Fashion arbiters, however, in their all-encompassing wisdom, have decreed that anybody who is anybody adopt the "elegance" of sunglasses during every waking moment; at the supermarket, walking the dog, taking the kids to the park, standing a fashion show, shopping, playing bridge, speaking at the P.T.A., at guest at a dinner party, even attending the theater.

This means, of course, that a woman should have at least four pairs of dark specs to match or contrast with her costumes.

Last year, American women bought 123 million pairs of sunglasses, and the Sunglass Institute, which has more than a passing interest in the trend, hopefully estimates that this year women may buy at least 40 million more, in varying shades, shapes, and prices.

For the quizzical are the "Ben Franklins," elongated oblongs to give the wearer an intellectual, if somewhat squint-eyed appearance; the large, bonerimmed that rest on the cheekbones (featured in a popular modern movie); the most-triangular, and "The Welder"—like eye-protectors used by welders and sculptors, covering half the face with only a tiny triangular arc over the nose.

For those who have a wardrobe of sunglasses, there are the octagonal, for whatever reason they might choose them. And the "wrap-arounds" from ear-tip to ear-tip. Nobody is going to look into the eyes of wearers of these!

AS TO COLORS, the gamut: gray, blue, amber, twilight, midnight. And when a lady, wearing midnight sun glasses at midnight in a dimly lit restaurant turns her head toward you, you begin to wonder if she is blind, didn't have time to put on her eye make-up, is half-asleep, is cross-eyed, or perhaps has a black eye.

Even in the daytime, with glasses getting broader, longer, more encompassing, it is sometimes difficult to recognize even your best friend, with only a mouth and chinline to guide you.

As a permanent fixture of the face, as natural for the eyes as lipstick is for the mouth—morning, afternoon, evening, aren't we going a bit overboard to the enrichment of "shade" manufacturers?

ON THE other side, getting into the glamour act, a certain teenager we know who hates to wear her glasses to a dance (and without them can't recognize, friends) finds that prescription sunglasses are the A-OK answer. "They think I'm wearing them for effect," she confesses. "I am. For the effect of seeing!"

As for their effect on the Head of the House... We were sitting on the side porch, discussing a family problem—finances, if the truth be told—both of us wearing our "shades."

Tantalizingly through my mind came the thought, "Does he really believe this is a worthwhile investment? Wish I could see his eyes—they eyes always show what he is thinking."

"Oh, for heaven's sake," the Head of the House exploded. "Take those glasses off I can see only half your face. I've learned to read your mind through your eyes. They say more than your tongue does. It clicks."

Reminds us of the oldie: "The light that lies in woman's eyes, and lies, and lies and lies..."

Do we, perhaps, hide too much of that light, for fashion's sake, blocking communication, concealing those God-given "windows of the soul"? Maybe so!
