Coriolanus
 by EUPHEMIA WYATT

CORIANUS—Five hundred years before Christ, Rome had disposed of her Kings and become a republic divided between two factions: the Patricians—descendants of the tribal chieftains, and—Plebeians: the common people. Nowdays, Conservatives and Labor.

Caius Marcius was the only son of a very patrician widow who raised her only child to be a soldier. Fighting his first battle at sixteen Marcius had twice won Rome's Congressional Medal—the oak, a golden circlet of leaves—and, as the play opens, he wins it for the third time: when he takes the Volscian city of Corioli single-handed and from henceforth was known as Caius Marcius Coriolanus.

His nomination as Consul had, however, to be confirmed by the plebeians and their two Tribunes. Coriolanus was young but proud and he balked at the ordeal of winning votes by showing off his twenty-seven Seoul — (NC) — Five orphaned Korean girls are on their way to new homes in the United States found for them by Catholic Relief Services — National Catholic Welfare Conference.

Middleton Murray considers "Coriolanus" a finer tragedy than King Lear but it has never been popular because Coriolanus is not a sympathetic character. New York first saw it in 1799 and then not again until 1954 with Robert Ryan at the Phoenix Theatre. Strange to say this summer it has had two productions by the New York Shakespeare Festival (Central Park) and the American Shakespeare Festival (Stratford, Conn.).

Both were interesting and exciting and under the direction of Gladys Vaughan in New York. Robert Burr by giving Marcius a boyish personality actually succeeded in making him likeable of at least excusable. In Stratford, Philip Bosco, directed by Allen Fletcher, was obstinately vindictive although he did show his passionate devotion to his family. To compensate, Aline MacMahon imparted a trace of Irish humor to her Volturnia and made it more than ever clearly that it was quality completely lacking in her son.

Patrick Hines also gave his Menenius a twinkle that always won him a hearing by the people. In New York Jane White played Volturnia as full of pride as her soldier son but of superior intelligence. Staats Cotsworth impressed himself upon the plebeians more by his forceful dignity than geniality. The Lady Valeria, the friend of Marcius' timidly devoted wife, as played by Marcie Hupert, managed to build up the whole character of a young Roman, fashionable, smart and frivolous in very few lines.

One small but touching feature was that Marcius' little son was really Burr's own sturdy child with a brother as understudy! It must also be noted that in New York, the Roman people were all dressed in natural colored tunics, ragged and soiled while the Volscians were neat and clean. The Roman Senators were also spotless.

In Stratford, the plebeians' tunics were simple and light colored but by no means rags. The Volscians, however, were rather a fearsome sight with shoulder length, shaggy, uncombed black hair and black moustaches. Their legs and bodies were encased in salmon pinkish tights with trimmings of black fur that might have been bear.

Their servants wore short pinkish tunics. Their soldiers carried round shields and short swords like the Romans. Both productions found some good comedy in the Volscians' servants when Marcius enters disguised during a dinner party.

"Coriolanus" lacks poetry or quotable lines but it has plenty of action and both productions prove that Menenius is a fine part for an older man as is Volturnia for an older actress. They can count on sympathy from an audience who is apt to grudge any to Caius Marcius.
