Jesuit Says

Priority Due High Schools

Washington — (RNS) — Money and manpower now being spent on "second-rate" Catholic colleges would be better employed if used to develop first-rate secondary schools, according to Father Neil G. McCluskey, S.J.

The Jesuit educator, a visiting professor of education at the University of Notre Dame, made his recommendation in a new 211-page study issued by the National Catholic Educational Association entitled, "What is Happening to Catholic Education?"

"The need for more good Catholic high schools is so great that we should divert manpower and money from the college level to achieve this aim," Father McCluskey said. "I am referring to the many second-rate institutions whose future as solid four-year colleges is extremely doubtful."

"Dozens of them should revert to junior college status. Many others should be changed over and allowed to become first-rate secondary schools."

Father McCluskey pointed to an "elitist" tendency as a growing trend in Catholic secondary education.

"Some 88 per cent of America's Catholic high schools now require admissions tests and more than 80 per cent charge tuition," he said. "Very quietly the principle seems to be operating that since there is no room for everybody in the Catholic high school, we take the better prepared youngsters whose parents can afford to pay the tuition and fees."

The Jesuit educator said that the Catholic schools are stronger because of recent criticisms because they did not seek "refuge behind a clerical curtain." He had this advice for parents:

"Despite the assumption of some people, the state-established secular school has no prior claim on the allegiance of all citizens, and no parent is in the slightest degree 'disloyal' when he exercises his natural right to patronize his own school."
