End is Seen Coming For 'Condemned' Films

By J. D. NICOLA

New York—The "condemned" movie rating — strongly associated with the old Legion of Decency but still retained by its successor, the National Catholic Office for Motion Pictures — is undergoing an important transformation that will probably culminate in a re-naming of that famed category or its abolishment altogether.

The most significant change that has occurred, chiefly in the last three years, is that the "C" classification no longer means what it used to mean: namely, that any film placed in that category was judged to present great potential moral harm to the viewer.

Combined with this is the growing suspicion at NCOMP that however effective the threat of a condemned rating is in maintaining certain standards of morality in films, it may actually be doing the film office's apostolate more harm than good.

The transformation in the "C" category's meaning can be seen in the condemned ratings given to a number of films over the past several years, among them: "The Silence," "The Pawnbroker," and the more current "Loves of a Blonde" and "Blow-Up."

While at one time the film office suggested that all condemned films should be regarded as "positively bad," recent NCOMP commentaries indicate that this is no longer the film office's attitude. Indeed, NCOMP observations on some "C" films, such as the above four, have had more good things to say than NCOMP has said — or will say — about many innocuous films that receive "A-1" ratings.

The reason for this apparent contradiction — a "C" but some good words — appears complicated at first (and this is one of the factors that may speed up the category's demise), but goes like this: NCOMP believes that without the ever-present threat of a condemned rating, some moviemakers who turn out films for mass consumption will put in increasing amounts of nudity and love-play. The film office believes that without an effective classification system whereby under-age moviegoers would not be allowed to see certain films, NCOMP has (almost by default) the moral obligation to force the movie industry to "hold the line" on nudity and sensuous scenes.

Rather than get involved in fine hair-splitting with the movie industry over what constitutes "sex for sex' sake" and what scenes might be perfectly valid in an adult-theme film, NCOMP has adopted an "across-the-board" policy for all films, regardless of their intended audience.

But totally aware that films like Ingmar Bergman's "The Silence," Antonioni's "Blow-Up" and the Czech "Loves of a Blonde" will have appeal primarily to mature audiences who will view the sensual scenes in their proper context, NCOMP has groped for some way to assure this segment of Catholic moviegoers that their film office is not insensitive to honest, artistic expression geared for mature audiences, and that the film office does not regard their attendance at such films as betrayal.

Thus, NCOMP's condemnation of "Loves of a Blonde" carries the carefully worded observation: "This otherwise sensitive presentation of the lesson of life which a shy young girl learns from her first disillusioning experience with 'romance' is rendered unacceptable for general motion picture audiences because of an unnecessarily graphic seduction sequence."

Those who are aware of NCOMP's thinking in recent years know that the film office recognizes that there are film audiences other than "general" ones, and that "Loves of a Blonde" would have received at least an "A-4" rating (unobjectionable for adults, with reservations) if NCOMP were not in the middle of its nudity battle with the American film industry.

Notes film critic Moira Walsh, a long-time NCOMP consultant: "They condemned 'Blow-Up' because they didn't want to see films like 'The Swinger' (an Ann-Margaret film aimed at adolescents) in the form they would be if they didn't have the 'C' to hold over their heads."

Still, while officially objecting to 'Blow-Up' for "a sexual treatment which, in certain sequences of this film, will impress viewers as going beyond reasonable limits of moral acceptability for a public entertainment medium," NCOMP nevertheless cites its "brilliance of camera technique and beauty of image composition." As little as four years ago, the film office never said anything good about a film it was condemning, regardless of how brief the offending sequece.

NCOMP's distinction between films that are condemned in word and those that are condemned in spirit (there are still many of the latter, such as "Kiss Me, Stupid" and "Night Games") has been slow in reaching most Catholics, but in the last month two diocesan newspapers carried very favorable reviews of "Loves of a Blonde" and "Blow-Up" — both of them, significantly, by consultors on NCOMP's reviewing board.

In the Diocese of Paterson, N.J., "The Beacon" carried a review of "Loves of a Blonde" by George Keenen ("There isn't a slick, glib, or otherwise dishonest moment in the film") and "The St. Louis Review" went so far as to back up Brother George Wead's right to praise "Blow-Up." Said the newspaper in an editorial: "We do not subscribe to the idea that because of a 'condemned' rating a film has nothing more to be said for, or against, it."

But the "condemned" classification itself, close observers of NCOMP are certain, is being examined by NCOMP officials with a view to possible revision. A re-naming or abandoning of the "C" rating — perhaps within a year — could be forthcoming for at least five reasons:

1. The "condemned" category has fostered among Catholics a simple-minded approach toward films, making them more concerned about a film's rating than its content and value to them as individuals. The "C" category has backfired by giving Catholics a preference for what NCOMP officials call "safe, but mindless" films.

2. The "condemned" classification is too strongly associated with the old, negatively-oriented Legion of Decency. It's felt that the condemnations, infrequent though they may be, are taking too much attention away from what NCOMP really regards as its prime function: to educate filmgoers and create a climate for superior films.

3. The condemnations are even taking attention away from NCOMP's "B" category (morally objectionable in part for all), which contains many films that are much more serious threats to public morality than many "C" films — i.e., thoroughly sadistic films like "A Fistful of Dollars." Ironically, NCOMP places many films in "B" rather than "C" because "we don't want to give them that much notoriety."

4. The "condemned" category long ago became associated primarily with "sin" and the film office has, as a result, never been able to fully get across the concept of voluntary Christian witness in the filmgoer's selection of motion pictures.

5. Finally, there is the theory that the Catholic film office may have a more positive long-range effect on the movie industry if the industry is able to look upon NCOMP without thinking of it primarily as a box-office threat — which the "condemned" rating now represents. (Catholic Press Features)

Film on More

PARISHIONERS of St. Thomas More Church have reserved the Regent Theater on April 21 for a Family Movie Night performance of the prize-winning film, "A Man For All Seasons." Pictured is Paul Scofield in the role of Thomas More. Tickets are available by calling 244-4656.

Williams Drama, Glass Menagerie At Theatre East

Tennessee Williams' drama masterpiece, "Glass Menagerie," will be the closing production of Theatre East's inaugural season, March 30-April 9.

An early writing of one of the world's most distinguished playwrights, "Glass Menagerie" is still one of Williams' most moving and beautiful plays.

Unfolded with delicate nostalgia are the illusions and dreams of the Wingfield family . . . the dominating mother, a shy girl and the son who longs for adventure. Gradually their dream worlds partly open to reality when they have a gentleman caller.

Theatre East's cast for "Glass Menagarie" will be Ann Driscoll as Mrs. Wingfield, Myra Mailloux as Laura, Robert Blackburn as Tom and Bernie McInerney as the Gentleman Caller.

Playing at Theatre East through March 26, is the comedy, "Under the Yum Yum Tree." Tickets may be reserved by calling 334-9500. Subscriptions for next year are on sale at the theater, with a bonus of two tickets for "Glass Menagerie" for those who act now.

Peter Pan Playhouse Slates 'Young Mozart'

A New York production of the musical, "Young Mozart", will be presented by Peter Pan Playhouse at Theatre East, Friday, March 31, at 11:30 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. It will be the last presentation of this season's children's series.

"Young Mozart" is one of the Preludes to Greatness Series co-produced by Jay Harnick and Robert Adams. Recently it was selected by the Children's Theatre Conference for its New York Showcase as an example of outstanding plays for the young.

The story is Mozart's life as a young man in Salzburg and Vienna. The music, of course, is Mozart's taken from his great operas "Don Giovanni", "Marriage of Figaro", "The Magic Flute" and "Cosi Fan Tute."

Playing Mozart will be Jerry Grasse, who appeared on the Theatre East stage in 'Life with Father", "Hay Fever", "She Loves Me" and "Twelfth Night." Prior to stock and repertory experience, Jerry was soloist with the Milwaukee Symphony and Interlochen National Music Camp. Also he toured in two Harnick-Adams productions, "Young Mozart" and "Magic in King Arthur's Court".

Nancy Cheevers, who plays Mozart's sister, appeared in New York in "Morning Sun" and off-Broadway in "Cindy". She has played leading roles in numerous stock productions, including "High Spirits", "Once upon a Mattress" and "The Unsinkable Molly Brown."

Tickets for "Young Mozart" are priced at $1 each and are on sale at the Theatre East box office, Monroe Co. Fairgrounds.
