

Don't Give Up On Polygenism

Milwaukee — (NC) — The Church might in the future accept the evolutionary theory of polygenism, that all men do not derive from the same set of first parents, a German theologian said here.

Such acceptance, Msgr. Michael Schmaus told (Dec. 9) a Marquette University audience, would not change the Church's teaching on original sin.

"In the story of original sin," he said, "we are only speaking of the dialogue between man and God and nothing about the exterior or first appearance of first man. So our Catholic teachings are in no way contrary to a theory of evolution."

"Perhaps we must say that first man in the first moment in which he opened the eyes of the spirit made a rebellion against God and so the situation of salutary relation with God was not ever in this world until the actual coming of Christ, that first man sinned in the first moment he was able to reflect and recognize his dependence on God."
