They Want God In Constitution

SAIGON — (RNS) — Some 3,000 Catholics, including many priests, protest the omission of the word "Almighty" from South Vietnam's new constitution. Carrying signs, they staged a rally in Saigon. In the charter, a passage acknowledging the government's responsibility "before the Almighty" had been eliminated at the request of Buddhists and other religious minorities. The rally "paid off" and the disputed reference was restored to the final draft of the document.

Laymen Stress 'Communication'

(The following is a roundup of the April 5 to 8 convention of the National Council of Catholic Men.)
Pittsburgh—(NC)—How can the U.S. Catholic Church open up new avenues of communication involving the people of God?
That formed the overriding question at the biennial convention of the National Council of Catholic Men here early in April.
The answer that came from a number of speakers, from workshops and from off-the-record corridor conversations was that organization in the Church must provide for representative participation of all of the faithful.
The tone was set by the keynote speaker, Paulist Father Eugene Burke, who suggested that the Church should look to the American political experience in setting up new structures for renewal.
A theology professor at the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., Father Burke declared that a democratic form of organization may be the best way to insure that the Church will be constantly renewed.
Such a view, he said, conforms to the theology of the Second Vatican Council. He cited the concept of the Pilgrim Church, which must be "always reformed, renewed, always in process of purification."
Another speaker, Father Joseph O'Donoghue of Washington, D.C., was more direct in his suggestions. The priest, who is author of a newly published book, "Elections in the Church," asked: "Can we really expect that Vatican II's ideal of close communication and collaboration between clergy and laity will operate without elections?"
He said that all major officers in the Church—including bishops and the pope—should be elected for fixed terms through a form of representative democracy.
Bishop John J. Wright of Pittsburgh, however, declared that no matter what form the Church in the future takes, it will not be essentially different from the Church now or in the past.
He emphasized that at the present time the Church is going through a crisis of culture, and not one of faith.
The bishop stated: "To the extent that political democracy may underscore or help realize values more close to the humane or to the truths of faith concerning man... democracy has important and welcome influences for change to bring to bear on the secondary structures of the Church."
Bishop Wright said that theological values, rather than political or cultural values, remain dominant in shaping Church structure. He predicted that in the future the concept of the priesthood of the laity and of public opinion in the Church will be more strongly emphasized.
A Protestant speaker, the Rev. Dr. Robert C. Dodds, in a comparison of Catholic and Protestant church structures, pointed out that all of the churches have their own peculiar problems relating to structure. He compared the U.S. Catholic Church to a dinosaur—lacking "the central coordinating intelligence which could get its massive parts to move together."
Dr. Dodds, an associate general secretary of the National Council of Churches, noted that none of the other churches—Methodist, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Episcopal, United Church of Christ and others—has yet found a way to speak with a united voice on major national issues and affect the life of the nation as a whole.
The churches, he said, seem either "agile but weak, or mammoth but muscle-bound."
Among other program speakers who addressed themselves to the problem of building new Church structures were a sociologist and a management consultant.
The sociologist, Father Rocco Caporale, S.J., has been making a comparative study of the laity in France, Chile and the United States for the Center for International Studies at Berkeley, Calif.
Father Caporale said that the Second Vatican Council's emphasis on the "people of God and universal priesthood of the faithful" is "loaded with explosive potentialities." He said that interpretation of conciliar statements "projects them considerably beyond the original vision and context in which the Church Fathers stated them."
He stated that "the full implications of this new Church self-image will unfold in dialectical fashion and will gain acceptance."
A management consultant, Dean James L. Hayes of Duquesne University's School of Business Administration, took the occasion to announce the establishment of a new management institute for church personnel. It will provide administrative courses for pastors of all denominations and familiarize the clergy with techniques of management.
The 300 delegates from 77 dioceses themselves had some specific suggestions to make regarding the establishment of new Church structures.
In a policy statement ratified by the delegates, the National Council of Catholic Men asked the U.S. Catholic bishops to establish a "pro tem" National Council of the Laity to study and make recommendations to the bishops for the coordination of the lay apostolate throughout the nation.
The policy statement warned that if a new official structure is not speedily established "the corresponding possibility is that new lay structures, especially those focused on communication and dialogue, will arise outside the institutional Church."
The proposed temporary National Council of the Laity would be made up of members of the existing Joint Councils Executive Board. The latter group is made up of officers of the National Councils of Catholic Men, Women and Youth.
The delegates asked for the establishment of corresponding lay councils on the parish and diocesan levels.
Archbishop Joseph T. McGucken of San Francisco, chairman of the Lay Organizations Committee of the National Council of Catholic Bishops, endorsed the proposal in a closing address at the convention.
"Unless some person or committee is given the right and the duty to receive the expressed desires of laymen, and present them for review and discussion, we will have no structure to channel communications from the pew to the chancery and to the National Conference of Catholic Bishops."
"Can we not establish in each parish, each deanery, each diocesan council and in the national councils a communications secretary or committee?"
The four-day convention was also the occasion for announcement of a major project of the National Council of Catholic Men to educate the laity in "the spirit of renewal." A newly published course for lay discussion groups was distributed to the delegates.
Martin H. Work, NCCM executive director, announced the renewal program at a news luncheon. The 70-page book, designed as a seven-part discussion course, will be promoted through dioceses throughout the nation.
In a series of resolutions on national and social issues, the delegates defended the U.S. position in Vietnam as "a morally defensible activity," urged that the anti-poverty program be given one of the highest priorities, supported Pope Paul VI's plea for wealthy nations to aid developing ones, advocated open occupancy laws and condemned miscegenation laws.
