

DCCW Votes To Retain Structure

The Rochester Diocesan Council of Catholic Women (DCCW) will continue to function as a part of the National Council of Catholic Women.

The decision was made in a marathon, four and a half hour session of the DCCW's board of directors held at Fairport's School of Religion building last Sunday (Sept. 17).

In a tense, often emotional meeting, the directors voted 25-19, to retain the basic structure of the DCCW as it now exists.

The group also elected Miss Josephine Fitzgerald of Hornell as president of the DCCW for a two-year term. group structured in a way comparable to similar Protestant and Jewish groups for future cooperation, and the need for a unified diocesan leadership of Catholic women's groups.

The "break away" group, citing evidence in decline of the local DCCW (130 affiliates now compared to 179 five years ago), annual convention workshop attendance drop of some 400 women in the same time span) opted for structures independent of the national body.

The issues were argued at length, some hassling took place over the acceptance of several proxy ballots and then the voting took place.

The decision was to stick with the national organization.
