Welfare Freeze Racial Tension May Intensify

BY JOHN R. SULLIVAN (NC News Service)

In 1967, as Congress was considering a large hike in Social Security benefits for the elderly, widows and their children—benefits increases which all agreed were much needed—the House suddenly attached to the bill a measure which could very well contribute to the urban racial crisis in 1968.

While voting to increase benefits to Social Security recipients, the House and Senate voted to put a "freeze" on federal welfare payments under the Aid to Families of Dependent Children (AFDC) program—the largest and, according to most experts in the field, the most needed of public welfare's half-dozen aid categories.

This freeze, which goes into effect on July 1, was largely criticized as an "anti-Negro" measure, an expression of congressional white backlash in the wake of 1967's big-city riots, and a harsh reply to spokesmen of the nation's growing welfare rights movement.

But the freeze, which is going to either cost the states large sums of money if they are to keep the AFDC payments at their present level for all applicants, or will cost the recipients money in terms of decreased payments, had its roots in a trend which has been alarming legislators and welfare administrators for several years.

In the 10 years between 1951 and 1961 the number of children receiving AFDC aid rose 60 percent in terms of absolute numbers, or from 3.2 percent of all children to 4 percent. In the past seven years, the rate of increase has been even higher. In 1967, about 5 percent of all children were receiving AFDC payments.

Yet during that same period, the number of old-age assistance recipients decreased by some 400,000, to slightly more than 2 million.
