

Black Power Called Key to Urban Crisis

By E. B. DUARTE

San Antonio — (NC) — The nation's most pressing urban problems will not be resolved without the full realization of black power, a prominent social welfare teacher and writer insists.

He is Dr. Richard A. Cloward, professor at the Columbia University School of Social Work. With Columbia colleague Frances Piven, he is co-author of numerous articles on welfare and the Welfare Rights movement. Cloward was interviewed here at Our Lady of the Lake College, where he conducted a three-day seminar on "Issues in the Contemporary Urban Crisis" sponsored by the college's Worden School of Social Service.

Cloward said one of the reasons for urban racial unrest is that city governments — still tied to the white-working and middle class — are not responsive to the needs of black residents.

Another factor causing the neglect is that Negroes are not organized, he said. "Unless blacks unify, they are never going to get anything. One thing they want is a responsive government, and if they have a majority in a city, they want control — and properly so."

To accomplish this goal blacks must develop a common discipline, conduct effective voter registration drives and agree on candidates.

"This is coming. The largest cities in America are going to come under black control within the next 10 years." He said the political takeover will be a certainty in such metropolitan areas as Philadelphia, Cleveland, Gary, Detroit and Newark, on the basis of "sheer numbers," he predicted.

Acknowledging that the needs of the whites from metropolitan to suburban areas would reduce the city's real estate tax base, Dr. Cloward speculated that black control would prevent the black-controlled cities from providing services to their constituents.

"The way it is now," he explained, "whatever resources a city has, with the exception of welfare funds, are spent on groups other than blacks. The whites are getting everything now; the blacks are getting nothing."

The sociologist explained that although whites will reside in the suburbs in the next 10 years, they will continue to commute to their jobs in the cities. He also pointed out that big corporations will maintain their operations in the cities, and that these firms must continue to rely on the local government for various services.

"If black people, who will assume control of the municipal government, say to the white community that there are not enough funds to go around, and that the lion's share is going to the black constituents," whites would join blacks to pressure the federal government for larger subsidies for the cities, he said.

The whites who work in the cities and live in the suburbs aren't slow asking for federal funds to assist the blacks because they don't care, he added.

"That's where I see the money coming from — not from real estate taxes but from the federal treasury which is much larger and is based on more progressive forms of taxation, such as corporate profits and personal income, which more accurately reflect the gross national product."

The eventual development of new coalitions in the metropolitan areas should lead to the creation of more jobs in the public sector, he noted, thus helping to solve the unemployment problem in the ghettos.

"There is a tremendous amount that can be done in conservation, pollution control and housing construction.

This is work that relatively unskilled men can do if society determines it is willing to spend the money to create these resources," he said.

Does white America have the will to do this?

"It doesn't have it now," Cloward said, "that's for certain. I don't see white America doing this out of any humane or just reasons. They've got to be made to hurt, to feel the urban crisis too, and not just to be able to move away and evade it."
