Teenage Movie Makers Win Awards

Stanley Kubrick, make room. Amateur movie makers are taking over!

By PINCER LEAVEN

From all over the nation, the entries of young film makers poured into the Eastman Kodak Offices as part of the annual Teenage Movie-Makers' Contest. And many were astounding examples of creativity spurred by our increasingly visual culture.

Among the best was a senior class project done by two former McQuaid students, Raymond Villard and Christopher Rogers, entitled "Expedition to the Red Planet." Intricate models, carefully manipulated through animation, projected what the filmmaker's idea of what man's first landing on the planet Mars might be like. The space crafts, Mars itself with its strange plant and animal life, and even the possibility of finding the ruins of an ancient Martian civilization are all simulated in the film. The narration, researched in depth, provided factual background for the producers' speculations. The judge praised the film as "a tremendous job of planning and execution. . . . a well con-ceived and a superlative job of previsualizing man's first expedition to Mars" "Expedito a Red Planet" tied for third place

Also receiving third place. and very worthy of note was "Sand Castles," which came in from California. This film, produced by Charles Lewin. is a senstitive and evocative story of a young boy who day- away.

grieving mother and friends at the grave side. Then, in flashbacks unfolds the story of a short, unhappy life of a popular singer, thrown out as a no-good by a shrewish moth er, going on to win fame and fortune as a teen-age idol, exploited by wife mother and

The technical perfection and the sensitivity of the artist were so remarkable that the judges of the competition noted that the film could only be criticized on a professional basis and that it was undoubtedly the best shown in the competition.

An interesting technique used by Mr. Driscoll was his editing of the film according to sound rather than sight. Questions, inanities, prayers, chatter, screams, and silences are repeated over and over with tremendous impact.

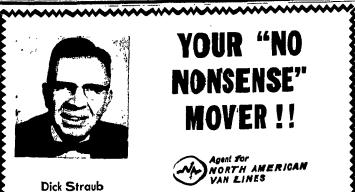

The competition was sponsored by the Eastman Kodak Company in cooperation with the University Film Foundation and the council for International Nontheatrical Events (CINE), which chooses films among the winners for showing at foreign film festivals.

That education crisis which newspapers and TV treat as a phenomenon peculiar to out time is actually as old as the world. The first parents to wonder "what did we de wrong?" when it dawned or them that they had raised a juvenile delinquent were Adam and Eve.

But then they might have realized that Cain was jus one of the more unfortunate consequences of the Affain of the Apple.

Our times didn't inven hippies, either. To judge from contemporary reports the Children's Crusade of the 13th Century was the greates hippie happening ever. Ima gine 30,000 French and 20,000 German dropouts on the march!
