

As I See It

A Public Glimpse of Royalty

By PAT COSTA

We Americans may disavow any particular love for royalty, but to say we have no interest in their way of life is something else again. I've no idea the number of housewives who sat down a week or so ago to watch the investiture of Prince Charles of England as Prince of Wales, but my guess is that there were plenty. A somewhat jaded relative of mine who sat and watched with me termed the whole show "ridiculous" and said that all she could think of was the number of people starving in the world. "And, look," she said, "at what this must have cost." If it was any consolation to her, English taxes, for once, paid for this television spectacular and not American dollars. But, I think she was just determined not to enjoy it. I, on the other hand, ogled and scrutinized every royal figure, noting Margaret's plumpness, Charles' ears and the Queen's unbending carriage. It was with pleasant surprise that I noted the royal young man's voice was charming indeed. And that he is much better looking than the candid shots we see so often in the newspaper. As for the ceremony itself, a rather empty one, it seems hardly likely to endear the royal family to the Welsh. It may be the mother in me but no matter how gorgeous the scenery in any TV special, it is always outshone, well almost always, by the youngsters who usually show up. In the Don Ho spectacular of last week, the Hawaiian singer brought a group of his small son's friends to the video screen to sing the popular "Hey, Jude." Perhaps they were merely all-TV extras signed up to look like friends, but there was just enough rambunctiousness to make me think otherwise. Don Ho deserves his current popularity. He comes on warm, smooth and ingratiating.

Among the guests, Carol Lawrence acquitted herself admirably but in this case she did not outdistance the eye-catching Pacific wonderland. Ho's show was sponsored by Kraft Foods and if any set of commercials deserves a special award for accomplishing what it set out to, it is this one. The colors are luscious, the food mouth-watering and the ideas ingenious — almost enough to make a girl set up a laux at 10 o'clock at night. And special credit to announcer Ed Herlihy who for years has been soothing me with his smooth-as-mayonnaise voice.
