The Night They Closed 'the Palace'

By PAT COSTA

After seven years of helping to fill the Saturday night television schedule, "Hollywood Palace" bowed out last week with a program that verified what we had always sus-

Namely that there is a much better show taped every week by many producers of variety type formats than the one the public is allowed to see.

With Bing Crosby as emcee before a studio of empty seats, the "Palace" finale gave us a look backward, a sampling of the many acts that had filled the show since 1963.

Highlight of the hour was tapes of bloopers made by the celebrities and edited out by the producers before the show ever hit the screen.

We saw, among others, Perry Como, Sammy Davis Jr., Englebert Humperdinck and Jimmy Durante flubbing their lines as hosts.

We saw Durante again, teamed with Peter Lawford in a Dutch boy fiasco that had the former breaking up his younger partner with ad lib after ad lib.

There was a scene with Victor Borge having unrehearsed piano

A highwire artist who continually kept falling off the wire had not planned it that way.

Dancers fell down, singers forgot the words to songs and a trapeze artist lost his pants - all not originally included in the acts.

The rest of the program was devoted to memorable and not so memorable bits and pieces of performances by big names, no longer around.

Judy Garland in a tramp outfit "waltzed down the avenue", Ed Wynn showed a new invention and Bert Lahr with Bette Davis did their famous "jealous husband" routine, Debbie Reynolds took part in a tumbling act, Don Knotts shook his way through a speech and Dean Martin crooned a bit.

On the whole it was an interesting fun hour, probably better than most of the individual shows the "Palace" ever presented.

The latest scuttlebutt regarding that phenomenon of television programming, "Sesame Street": A mother of twin pre-schoolers tells me that in a conversation with an elementary school principal, she was told that a re-evaluation of the kindergarten system will have to be made. Seems that the kindergartners now engaged in going to school on a half-a-day, fiveday-a-week basis aren't learning as much as the preschoolers sitting home watching Sesame Street one hour a day.
