

Students Will Move to Save the Planet This Spring

By JAMES STACKPOOLE
(NC News Service)

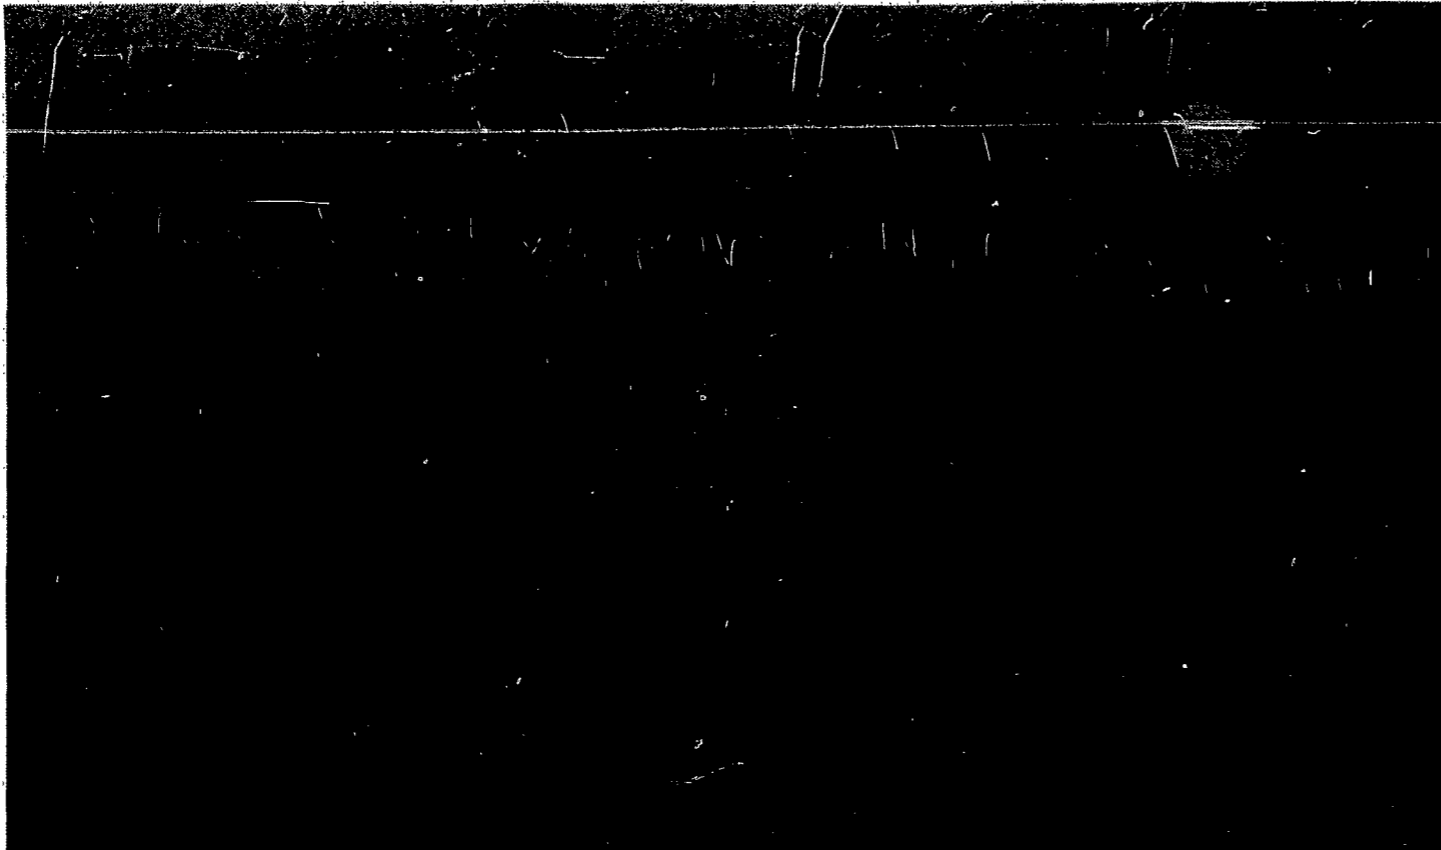

Ann Arbor, Mich. — The youth of the country, who a short while ago marched under the banners of Kennedy, McCarthy and peace, may march again this spring under the sign of ecology and environment.

This new banner was first raised in the air pollution over the University of Michigan during a five-day "Environment Teach-in." It will continue to be raised as more than 1,000 high schools and universities across the country prepare for the national teach-in April 22.

The similarities involved in the presidential campaigns of 1968 and today's anti-pollution drives both captured the enthusiasm of students whose energies seem boundless. Both found the nucleus of volunteer help on college and high school campuses and educational processes for the workers as well as the listening citizen. Both have political objectives.

The 18-year-old vote will help the movement but not as much as the interest of the "over 30" generation.

More than a thousand workers and organizers helped produce Michigan's teach-in. Nearly half of them were from the community of Ann Arbor surrounding UM. The environmental teach-in was the first demonstration on campus that the community actively helped with their time and buildings.

This may be the secret of the teach-in—involving and helping the local community. The UM organizers — ENACT — not only brought in from all over the country the idealists of conservationism and ecology but they also included local community representatives to consider the pollution of the Huron River which flows through Ann Arbor.

A river walk explained to citizens where and how steps could be taken to clean up and beautify their river. The teach-in examined man's environment and its pollution from all sides, legal defense, commercial, social, urban, agricultural, political, economic and moral.

In more than 125 workshops and seminars as many as 13,000 persons in a single day would study intellectual pollution, the future of the Great Lakes air pollution, marine transport pollution, auto pollution and pollution control.

Professional ecologists ranged from Barry Commoner to the director of Michigan's natural resources, Ralph MacMillan; to radical author-ecologist Murray Bookchin who wrote "Highways Are Pollutants. So is the Car. So is the City." From Washington came Sen. Edmund Muskie of Maine. TV personalities also were there.

Arthur Godfrey was heckled briefly for his TV commercials with enzymes but Eddie Albert turned on his audience of 200 with a long list of wrongs done to the nation's environment and received a standing ovation for it.

Ralph Nader packed a thousand into Hill auditorium for an address on "Citizens for Political Action."

A number of speakers were treated less kindly. Walter Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers and Ted Doan, president of Dow Chemical were repeatedly heckled during their panel discussion with Sen. Muskie and Bookchin.

The blame for pollution of the environment was shifted many times from population explosion, to industrial sewage, to government waste, to corporation exploitation, to consumer excess, depending upon who was speaking during the week. Speakers got reactions from statements such as:

"Our fundamental problem is what I would like to call our 'chamber of commerce' syndrome, that growth is good," said Cornell University ecologist Lamont Cole.

"The cities have been taken over by automobiles, but 41 per cent of the population is excluded (by age, infirmity and income) from the use of cars. We have to get over this love affair with the automobile," declared Yale University sociologist Lincoln Day.

"There is no question whether there will be a revolution," said environmental attorney Marvin Durning. "You are in it. You are it."

"I am in basic disagreement. I consider the automobile a convenience," said Ford Motor Co. pollution engineer Donald Jensen.

"The U.S. Department of Agriculture is criminal in its attitude on DDT. They are testing it on us," charged Albert.

"We do our best to stay one full step ahead of the legal requirements. We think we're being good citizens to do this. General Motors is committed to taking the automobile out of the smog problem," emphasized Jack Quick, assistant controller of General Motors.

The influence of these teach-ins may be immediate — cleanup committees in local communities may be formed — or they may be long ranged, sponsoring candidates for political office. A prediction of their strength and potential to accomplish their goals can be measured on April 22, "E Day."
