

Up the Hollers . . . with Love

(By Religious News Service)

Freda Harris is a legend around Hellier, Kentucky. Her life is literally given to fellow mountain people and their physical and spiritual well-being.

For 16 years she quietly supported herself in this apalachian hill country by working in stores owned by coal mining companies. In spare moments, she conducted Bible school classes "up the hollers" — in isolated mountain valleys — where she would also give guidance, assist with food and clothes and carry the sick to doctors. She became an ever-present angel whose life has redeemed others from sadness, despair over broken homes and the pangs of hunger and loneliness.

In 1962, the Southern Baptist Home Mission Board purchased a mission center and appointed Miss Harris director. She now drives daily up the "hollers," picking up children for the center's weekday programs.

In top photo, Miss Harris visits a mountain home and talks with teenagers involved in work of the mission center.
