

Plan Protection for Your Outdoors Equipment

Imagine the convenience of an outdoor beauty parlor, as pictured above, with the help of plastic containers from the kitchen.

A Word to the Wise . . . Woman Who Moves Into Outdoors

Outdoor adventures no longer are the sole property of men. Booming popularity of outdoor camping has brought the entire family out of doors and into the wilderness. For women, a knack for outside domestic talent has become as necessary as the sharp-shooting eye of the hunter in the family.

Sewing items are required in the campsite occasionally. Clothes are likely to become snagged and torn, buttons can come off, and camp gear made of thin material can be ripped. These possibilities focus attention on the basic elements: needles, threads, buttons, and a thimble.

Keeping these articles together makes quick repair work available in an instant. It's easy to keep sewing articles when stored away in a Tupperware 16-ounce Square Round.

Additional neatness can be achieved by putting needles in one sealed 2-ounce Midget and buttons in another. When the Midgets are laid on their sides, the Square Round can be sealed to make a compact sewing kit container that will hold all the mending equipment necessary.

A first aid kit is a priority item from the moment the car leaves for the campsite. When trouble arises in the form of a cut finger, an insect bite, or an upset stomach, the first aid kit rushes to the top of the list of aids needed by would-be nurses. Keep a place set aside for prescription pills and drugs. A small flashlight tucked away in the first aid kit can be helpful.

A plastic air-tight Stow-N-Go makes an ideal storage container for first aid necessities compactly stored and sterile.

Women campers no longer need worry about who will see them with their hair rolled or without a face. Cosmetics aren't the easiest personal effects to carry to the woods or mountains, but with a little imagination and a Tupperware catalog you can come up with several ways to carry just about anything you'll need to be as beautiful as ever.

FUEL NEEDS

The average family cooking outdoors on a gas grill will use one or two 20-pound cylinders of LP gas during the summer.

Plastic Containers with Seals Offer Safety from the Elements for Food Supplies to Cameras

The outdoors is a place to come alive . . . an opportunity to leave work behind . . . to relax and escape from the fast-paced pressures of urban living. Whether it's winding up a line with a fighting bass on the other end or unwinding everyday tensions with a backyard cookout, there's a place for everyone outdoors.

Once the recreation bug bites, however, be aware that there no longer will be a roof over your head. Modern conveniences are something that wise woodsmen take along with them.

Nature offers some challenging tests as well as opportunities. To meet the challenges of the wilderness . . . plan ahead. A checklist of things to bring is important. Think carefully of needs you will have in your outdoor sojourn and make sure you have the answer before journeying outside.

Rain can spoil any recreation activity . . . and not only for the few minutes one has to wait indoors waiting for the sunshine to come back out.

Equipment left out of doors during a sudden storm can be ruined if not properly cared for and sheltered. Food, beverages, and apparel all are in danger of becoming suddenly soggy, unless the proper precautions are taken care of.

Some Considerations

Cover is a necessity . . . cover suitable to the magnitude of your particular outdoor visit. Easily erected shelters make housing outside available in an instant. More ambitious recreation buffs might find camper-trailers more desirable.

Make sure the camping equipment you get is large enough for your needs . . . and tough enough to contend with the area you plan to use it in. Be sure that it will fit in your traveling vehicle before you embark outdoors.

An easily obtainable means of keeping food and equipment dry and clean is plastic containers. Tupperware offers a wide range of plastic food storage containers adaptable to almost every conceivable aspect of outdoor recreational activity.

Food and sanitation are two items that especially require special attention outside. Tupperware materials offer shapes and sizes for all food items, big and small. The famous Seal locks in freshness and flavor . . . and keeps unwelcome guests out.

Has Compartments
Equipment, too, has a place in plastic containers. Rain, dust, and dirt are all kept out of vital working parts of reels, ammunition, and other necessities when plastic storage items are used. Tupperware's Stow-N-Go has compartments for arranging various materials. It can rain all day on rugged plastic containers and still remain dry inside.
