

Civil Rights Seen Key To N. Irish Crisis

Ithaca — The origins of the crisis in Northern Ireland were outlined at a meeting on the Cornell campus Feb. 12. Some attitudes of the Catholic minority and the views of a scholar who has studied Northern Ireland in depth were presented in a panel discussion. Invited, but absent, was a representative of the British government.

A point on which all speakers seemed to focus was that the unrest in the country was not basically caused by religious discrimination.

James Gaffney, a representative of the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association, hastened to make clear that the battle was not so much Protestant versus Catholic, but rather the Unionist majority who happen to be mostly Protestant against the non-Unionist Catholic. The Unionists have controlled the province for 50 years, he said; they control the land, government, and the economic base. What is needed to correct the existing imbalances is civil rights legislation fashioned after that enacted in the United States over the past decade.

Gaffney cited several specific measures which the NICRA seeks: First, he noted, legislation is required to change the current system of elections which purportedly perpetuates the Unionist government in numbers out of proportion to their majority by a skillful system of gerrymandering that minimizes minority representation.

Second, he called for legislation to curb discrimination in employment, which he alleged to be rampant particularly in situations where the government plays a role in hiring.

Third, he demanded that the Special Powers Act, which permits extensive searches of private dwellings and internment, be repealed. Finally, he expressed the belief that legislation will be needed to curb incitement to religious hatred, and recommended the appointment of an ombudsman to mediate some of the disputes arising between factions in the country.

Don Leon, a professor from the State University of New York at Cortland and a graduate of Trinity College in Dublin, echoed Gaffney on the essentially non-religious nature of the struggle. To clarify, he defined a religious conflict as one in which groups are seeking either to gain religious freedom or impose religious beliefs. He did not suggest, however, that Protestant vs. Catholic was not a dividing line in the warring faction.

Prof. Leon thought that the basic reason underlying the strong Unionist opposition to a British pullout is the fact that this would leave the current Northern Ireland majority a minority in a unified Ireland. Nevertheless, he continued, a British withdrawal is probably the only real hope of a solution. He felt that the factions would learn to cooperate if the disparities in their living and working conditions began to disappear.
