Too Many Missing Catholic Education?

Division of Religious Education statistics show that CCD effectiveness is not so great as it has been, according to Joseph Weber, administrative assistant to Father Albert J. Shamond, vicar of education.

Statistics based on infant baptism figures for the years 1954-1965, show that there are 140,894 Catholics of school age in the diocese.

"We did not pick up the increase in population; just by holding our own we fell behind," Weber said.

Father Daniel F. Holland, director of the Religious Education Division, stressed that more than 46,000 students are receiving no formal religious education at all, and he asked "where are the kids of the diocese getting their religion?"

There are about 31,000 pupils in Catholic schools grades 1-8 and 44,000 in CCD schools of religion grades 1-8, leaving 20,600 getting no religious education at the grammar school level, Father Holland continued.

The figures for high school age students worried Father Holland and Weber even more.

"In the Catholic schools we have 9,200 and in the CCD we have 10,000; leaving 25,700 high school kids getting none. And our parish census figures are not accurate or up to date enough to show how many high school kids we are missing."

As for a resolution to the department's problem of ineffectiveness, Father Holland said, "The people on parish education boards aren't aware of how grave our situation is. The right questions aren't being asked yet. They are still concerned with parochial school and not at all with those kids who are receiving nothing."

Weber said, "The only thing we can do is continue to work at it with help from anyone we can get."

Good Sports Get Together in Penn Yan

By ED and JOAN COFFEY

Penn Yan — For the 600 sports fans who jammed themselves into St. Michael's parish auditorium, Sports Nite will be remembered for its guests, its stories, and its delicious dinner.

For the children and the faculty of St. Michael's School, the evening will be remembered for the contributions its proceeds made to the operation of the school.

Headliners Pete Gogolak, Jim Crowley, Walt Patulski, Tommy Myer, Tom Niland, Billy Hassett, Chuck Fogarty, Al Cervi, and Carmen Basilio, all great names in sports, regaled the gathering with stories to the past and present, some true and some perhaps exaggerated.

For a good many of the older generation in Penn Yan, it was a chance to listen to and talk with their heroes of the past and the guys they have watched on television.

One such was Jack Murphy, who spotted Al Cervi during a pre-dinner get together and immediately broke away with the comment: "I've just got to meet Cervi. I used to watch him with the Nats and Royals."

It wasn't any time before Murphy and Cervi were going at it, reliving plays long forgotten by most fans.

Particularly, they discoursed on the seventh game of the 1955 championship series in the NBA, when Cervi coached the Syracuse Nats to their only world title.

It was on Easter Sunday and the Fort Wayne Pistons were going against the Nats in the big game.

"We were 17 points down with four minutes to go in the first half," noted Cervi, who remembered that "we were heavy favorites to win. I thought, 'if we blow this one, I'll kill myself.'"

But the Nats came back to pull out a 92-91 victory, which made it possible for Cervi to be alive and well and in Penn Yan last night.

Patulski, first choice in the 1972 National Football League draft by the Buffalo Bills, who expects to begin negotiations with the Bills next week, noted that Notre Dame, where he gained his fame, turned down a bowl bid in 1971, by a vote of players "because we felt it was not in the best interest of the university to go."

Fogarty, freshman coach at Syracuse, which four years ago made a bid to get the 275-pound defensive lineman, who had been a fullback at CBA, told why Patulski went to the Fighting Irish. Syracuse Coach Ben Schwartzwalder "promised Walt the mantle of Larry Csonka," who was graduating, but Fr. T. M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame, "promised him the mantle of the Pope."

Basilio joked that "fight managers never feel any pain, but if I talk funny, I've got an excuse."

Crowley, one of the Four Horsemen of Notre Dame, referred to Patulski's comment about the Bills being due in '72, by adding "mine are due the first of every months."

Crowley also noted the different receptions athletes get today, compared to his times. He pointed out that he was All-

America and the Irish were Rose Bowl champions, but when he returned home to Green Bay, the first person he saw said: "Hello, Jimmy, where the hell have you been all fall."

Gogolak then told of a long kickoff into the end zone and he began to slowly walk off the field. But he looked up "and here was this big guy coming toward me, carrying the ball. It was MacArthur Lane. I looked behind me and I realized I was the last guy to stop him. There were no Giants behind me. I'd been playing football for nine years and I never made a tackle. I completely froze," said Gogolak. Then Lane "tried to cut by me, which is usually very easy, but he stepped on the plastic kicking tee, tripped and ran into me. Everyone thought I made the tackle."
