

SARAH CHILD

All In The Family

I had gone to the local craft shop to pick up a pair of unfinished bookends that the owner had ordered for me.

Making small talk while she wrote out my purchase slip and made change, I commented on the convenience of having such a store in our own village.

There's been a great trend towards the arts and crafts just in the last 10 years hasn't there, I questioned her.

"More like the last five years," she corrected me and then immediately switched to the subject of candlemaking.

It was great fun, simple and she could help me get started was the tempting offer.

And, she added shrewdly, it wouldn't be as expensive as the decoupage projects I'd been doing.

She had a point there. I'd signed up for a decoupage course last January as a measure to combat the doldrums that usually hit me the first of every year.

The course which consisted of a two-hour session once a week for five weeks cost $10. But the materials sold by the shop running the class were something else. I ran up a bill for more than $60, a fact my husband won't know until he reads this.

On the whole, it was worth it. Not only did I find something I enjoy a great deal, but the satisfaction of producing something I'm not ashamed to display in our home has great supportive value for a ten-thumbed creature such as myself.

And if the amount of money that is being spent today in shops around our area is any indication there are a lot of other people who feel the same way.

Several friends are imaginative and skillful seamstresses, and the great resurgence of sewing lovely wardrobes for oneself predates all the other craft come-backs.

Others are caught up in the ceramics bag. I've no figures to support the contention but I've an idea this might be the most popular craft of all, excluding painting since it is an art.

One friend has taken to hooking rugs, carrying a small square with her from meeting to meeting. Another does gorgeous crewelwork. A third does wood-working. A fourth sandcasting.

Last time I went to get my hair trimmed the young operator showed me an eggshell which she had expertly cut and decorated with jeweled trim. She belonged to a craft club, she said, which tackled a new project every two weeks. Of course there is good precedent for women wanting to make things of beauty.

My gram has been making patchwork quilts all of her adult life in gorgeous patterns. I'm the proud owner of three of them.

And, in a bottom drawer of an old antique chest, is a bedspread I treasure equally as much. It was given to me by my grandfather. It was made by my father's mother the handiwork featuring delicate cherubs and angels and across the top the crocheted message: For Thomas By Mary.

Mental Health Commentary

By THE DE PAUL CLINIC

The following continues an answer to the question raised last week: Is there a simple way of identifying the "distrubed" child?

Teachers are in a key position to identify children with problems since they have the child over a period of months and can compare his school and academic adjustment with that of the other children in the class. Serious and persistent deviations from the classroom standard may suggest the need for further study.

A child's reaction to stress gives a clue to his way of adapting to life's problems. Some children overreact and others underreact. Evaluating this may be complicated beyond the average teacher's expertise but the extremes should be readily identifiable.

Special habits such as thumbsucking, hair twirling, digging the skin, habit spasms or tics, toilet accidents and similar problems may also be clues to the problems in personality maturation.

How the child sees himself in relation to others is of particular importance. A child who feels inferior doesn't like himself so will have trouble feeling liked by others. A child who acts superior to others is struggling against an inferiority feeling and, unfortunately, is inclined to antagonize others so they don't like him, a situation he is trying to avoid.

How a child relates to other people, both peers and adults, is important, especially his relationship with other children his age. Children may avoid such relationships or they may be bossy and inclined to fight. Children who frequently pick on younger children may be displacing resentment of being punished by older persons to the younger ones.

Children go through all kinds of emotional expressions but some are repetitive and stereotyped. Some children are always happy and always smiling. Others may seem to be reasonably content but startle easily or otherwise show tendencies to anxiety, possibly just in their expression but other times in their behavior. The same pertains to feelings of anger and depression.

Of Significance is the lack of expression of feelings (poker face). Such a child is difficult to "reach." It is difficult to know what he is feeling so it is difficult to respond appropriately. For example, if he is anxious and shows it, one can try to alleviate his anxiety. If he doesn't show it, then there is no attempt to reassure him and, indeed, there may be an inclination to be irritated at him, thereby increasing his anxiety.

A child who expresses the opposite of what he is feeling is even more complicated. For example, some children, when threatened, become anxious but act as though they are angry. The inclination of others may be to retaliate in kind. Unfortunately, this increases the anxiety and the outbursts of seeming anger. The cycle can be one that entrenches the pattern, resulting in increasing emotional disturbance and disturbing behavior.

Political Action Urged by Kearney Unit

Political action to aid non-public schools was undertaken at the Oct. 26 meeting of the Bishop Kearney High School Parents Club.

A resolution was sent to Rep. Frank Horton and to his opponent, Jack Rubens, urging them publicly to support the Mills-Carey Bill, H.R. No. 16141, which provides tax relief for the parents of private school children.

Rubens responded to the group that he favored the tax relief bill; Horton had not responded as of presstime.
