

MAUDE

By PAT COSTA

Abortion. A laughing matter? The producers of "Maude" the popular new situation comedy seen Tuesday nights on CBS, apparently thought it was. And so Maude, the show's fortyish heroine, a grandmother, became pregnant.

The listing in TV Guide for the two-part story gave only an oblique hint that the real thrust of the program would not center on late life pregnancy but rather on Maude's choice of solutions: abortion.

Viewers across the country accustomed to turning on the set without consulting TV previews found out the hard way that the subject matter was not only poor fare for their children but a direct assault on one of their deepest moral beliefs.

The reaction of such Catholic organizations as the Knights of Columbus and the Diocesan Union of Holy Name Societies as well as a multitude of smaller groups was sharp and immediate.

John W. McDevitt, supreme knight, protested in a letter to CBS: "The sophisms of the abortionists are about as dearly appreciated by millions of Americans as is rat poison in Halloween candy."

In a four-page, single-spaced missive to the network, Holy Name president William Moon called for "fairness time on the ground that abortion is a major controversial issue and that a pro-life program be presented within the framework of the Maude show supporting the right to life of unborn babies . . ."

In a letter to this column, an area woman, Mrs. Marilyn Timmons of Fox Meadow Road, Rochester, attacked a line in the first episode that has drawn the greatest wrath of individuals and groups alike.

Maude, played by actress Beatrice Arthur, discusses with her daughter (Adrienne Barbeau) the possibility of abortion and likens it to "having the dentist extract a bad tooth" and marveling over how wonderful it is that New York State is so progressive.

Mrs. Timmons continued, "Also mentioned freely were other forms of birth control with Maude's husband commenting, 'Darn it, I knew I should have had that vasectomy.'"

Mrs. Peggy Dawson of 179 Depew St., who sent us a copy of her letter to CBS, wrote, "Since my children are freely given information regarding family life, not a moment's thought was given the possibility that this might not be a show suitable for children. What I expected was a light-hearted spoof on the trials and tribulations of pregnancy late in life. How wrong could I have been?"

Obviously many viewers were taken in by assuming that this show might be mildly sensational in the manner of its parent series "All in the Family." Archie Bunker et al have dealt with homosexuality, menopause, impotence to name a few formerly taboo TV subjects.

While some see the abortion shows as a crude attempt at humor and an obvious assault on the moral views of a large segment of the nation, there are those who see it as possibly more.

That the format was a situation comedy rather than a news or information show is an interesting point.

Mrs. Jeanne Sweeney of the area Right-to-Life Committee notes that pro-abortion groups have declared it is not enough to deliver their message through television documentaries but to get entertainment shows to spread the acceptability of abortion on demand.

It is easy to see how fortuitous this could be for the abortion people. Not only would situation comedies reach a greater number of people but the humor format could trim the peaks of inhibition for those on the abortion fence.

Then, too, strong identification with a popular character who suddenly behaves in a manner many consider immoral may lead to rationalization on the viewer's part that if Maude or Archie do it, it must be okay and maybe the viewer is just behind the times.

Perhaps worst of all along this line is the realization that situation comedies do not ordinarily convey messages. Viewers are off guard, more susceptible to ideas they might ordinarily re-
