

Navigating Personal Plane Becomes Easy, Thanks to Airways System

Navigation by personal airplane—in a direct line over mountains, valleys, rivers and plains—has become a simple matter for everyone who flies, thanks to development of the modern airways system and the sophisticated electronic equipment available for today's aircraft.

Awaiting the aerial traveler are thousands of airports and vacation spots that cater to his every need, as well as being close to even the most "out of the way" business destination.

Basically, the system is composed of hundreds of special electronic radio stations located along federal air routes throughout the United States and other countries. Each broadcasts navigation "beams" which are tracked on a radio receiver in the airplane.

Whether flying across the nation or across the state, the procedure is simple. The pilot simply uses such stations to direct him along his desired route, much as an automobile driver checks highway signs to determine which road to take.

Combined with this is a well-developed radio communications network, which at all times enables the pilot to contact ground controllers who provide information and assistance.

By a simple press of a microphone button, the pilot can instantly obtain en-route weather information, conditions at his destination airport or anything else he needs to know.

In addition, a host of other equipment is available for today's personal airplanes. This includes such devices as automatic pilots, instrumentation for flying through clouds or above the weather, weather radar, electronic distance measuring equipment and special navigation devices for instrument approaches to airports.

Camping by personal airplane, one of the more popular recreational pursuits enjoyed by flying families, sets the stage for a weekend of fun and relaxation without the noise and crowds found at most public camping areas.
