

Scott Wells, above left, appears relieved that the ride is over. The three riders in the above photo couldn't help but grin when they found out they were going the wrong way.

ses Cash for Disease assist in emergencies and to stop riders if their bikes were found to be unsafe. The check points each offered a welcome drink and a word of encouragement, and a pick up truck made regular trips around the route to replenish the refreshment supply.

Rounding out the afternoon program was something for the kids who had completed the course. When riders completed the course they found hot dogs, free pop and popcorn were available at the starting point, the Holy Ghost Church parking lot. A band furnished live music under the welcome comfort of a shade tree.

Sue Gionta, one of the coordinators of the benefit, said that when the pledges are all in the group hopes to have $500 to turn over to the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

Staff members of check point one found that even sitting was enough to work up a thirst on the hot Sunday afternoon.

Holy Ghost parking lot as their favorite spot at the end of their ride.