'Bachelor' Class at Kearney

By JOAN M. SMITH

What to do about split ends what shampoo to use what haircut is best suited for a certain face were some of the hair problems discussed and demonstrated during a special presentation for Bishop Kearney's "bachelor living" group.

This class, an elective for seniors, is home economics for the man, and includes subjects for the fellow who will be living away from home. The class features "decorating the pad", "sewing", "cooking", and "Consumerism".

Recently, for a change of pace, "bachelor living" was opened to the young ladies for a special program given by hairstylists Frederick Reed, and his brother Gary. "We do this on a regular basis in all the schools," commented Frederick, and explained the demonstrations included trend haircuts, styles, information on corrective conditioning along with various hair products and their uses.

The stylists didn't lack models for their presentation. Boys were eagerly shampooed for cuts while girls volunteered for hairshaping.

The girls were enthusiastic about seeing the new styles, but sophomore Paula Car admitted, "I probably won't change the (hair) style, just the way I take care of it."

The fashion word for men these past few seasons has been long hair, but the trend is now swinging back to a neat medium to short length. In view of this change the boys were asked if the stylists demonstrated a man's short cut, would they follow suit. Senior Kevin Kyle emphatically answered, "No! I wouldn't go back to short hair."

Senior Bill Thompson agreed, "I'd keep my hair just over the ears, but not any shorter."

So, while scissors snipped, and blond-brunette locks were swirled and styled, Kearney students not only received an insight into the world of changing hair fashions, but also an in-depth look at basic hair care.

No doubt after seeing the new carefree natural look presented by the Reed brothers there will be changes in the hair scene at Bishop Kearney.
