Academy held its first "roles exchange day" during which the school and its operation was turned over to the student body. Total confusion, you say. Absolutely not! In fact, the students whose responsibility it was to direct school functions were calm and confident about their administrative and teaching duties.

Sophomore student principal Mary Loewenguth sat behind Principal Sister Mary Jean's desk and stated she was "nervous" but commented, "I was very excited when I was chosen to be prin-

Principal Loewenguth explained that students wishing to participate in the administrative exchange had to petition for five faculty signatures, and then their requests were voted on by a committee of students and

Mary's day as principal consisted of observing at meetings which were on Sister Mary Jean's Sister on the official role of a principal. Mary, along with her, vice principal, junior Donna Heberger, answered telephones, made public announcements, and issued student passes.

Mary was quite optimistic about her day's experience as an executive administrator. "I hope to learn about and appreciate the administration more. Just this morning," she exclaimed, "I've been going since 7:30. I don't know how they do it."

Sophomore Sara. treasurer of the Student Council, handled the arrangements for the exchange program. According to Sara, the students applied for various teaching positions, and their fellow classmates selected by vote their student teachers.

Much work went into preparing the program: Sara and her committee stayed after school nights to formulate a workable plan to present to the administration.

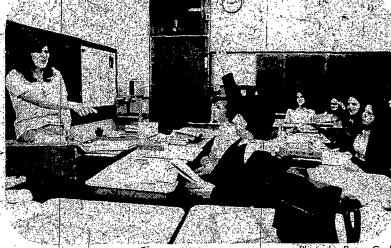

The "roles exchange day" idea caught on especially with the freshmen, and it resulted in a different class setting such as in freshman theology.

Linda Radke who is the regular theology instructor calmly sat in the back of the room listening while student Meg Gobeli in-structed her fellow classmates in their lessons

"It's different," acknowledged Linda, "but I am impressed with the way they are handling the Meg herself thought the idea "great" and she smiling added, "I get a good insight into what my teacher has to put up with when she's up here.

-By everyone changing places, students and faculty were made aware of each others duties as they gained an understanding of what it's like on the other side of the fence. Students experienced the responsibilities of leadership while the administration was introduced to the surprising capabilities of their students.

Meg Gobeli, teacher for the day, calls on fellow student Bernadette Bauer to answer question in freshman theology.
