A Guided Tour into the Future And What It Offers

By JOAN M. SMITH

The jingle says "let your fingers do the walking . . but if you happen to be a high school student not quite sure about your future, your fingers could wear out trying to tap all the career information resources.

In order to solve this awesome task, consolidate occupational data, and motivate students to decide on their future, the high schools have recently converted into busy career centers. Occupational lecturers, demonstrations, panel discussions, and individual information sessions were recently scheduled at Aquinas Institute, Nazareth Academy, and St.Agnes High School.

Friday, April 18 was a busy day for Aquinas students as they had the opportunity to investigate 40 careers some of which were accounting, electronics, forestry, real estate, social work, and telecommunications.

And investigate they did! Sophomore Chris Nuccitelli, on his way to hear the Radio Communications and Air Force representatives, stopped long enough to remark, "It's easy to get all your questions answered about careers rather then calling and visiting the various professions

One reason for the career project is to motivate students to think of their future, but also, according to chairman of the Aquinas Parents Action for Catholic Education (APACE) curriculum committee, Robert Thomson, "It is to give the students a better idea of what they are getting into when they leave school."

Plans for the Aquinas career day began last October and not only resulted in a wide cross section of occupational interests, but drew many of its alumni who, as representatives of their particular fields, enthusiastically gave the students a look into future opportunities.

Nazareth at Harley-Allendale/Columbia, 3:45 p.m. Travel agency reps Roxanne Trotto and Debbie Amsden discuss the many business opportunities in the travel field with interested Nazareth Academy students Debbie Fisher, Jody Taccone, Judy Holland, Carm Mangiola, and Elaine Milonni.

> Over at Nazareth Academy, during the week of April 21, the business students were given an in-depth look into the world of business and its employment possibilities.

"The object," explained Sister Ruth Maier, director of the Business Department, is for the students to see that their business subjects will open the doors of many areas not only in business, but in all fields of endeavor, and that their office training is a key to future employment experiences.

Nazareth

Nazareth's career project was in the planning stages for three months during which time a list of 40 career selections was offered the students from which to choose their preferences.

Nazareth graduates were among the many career representatives who participated in the project. Graduate Ann Febrey acknowledged it was her; first time as a career rep, but was looking forward to sharing her onthe-job secretarial knowledge with the girls.

The career week included seminars in the areas of communication, education, and journalism as well as discussions about the opportunities offered by retailing, data processing, and the military.

Student optimism about the school's business week was summed up by senior Nancy Felon who declared, "It broadens your mind about the different. opportunities, and let's you know about what you want to do?
