Plug misfire can kill 'cat'
Misfiring spark plugs have long been known to cause fuel waste and excessive emissions. They can now contribute to another problem — a non-functioning catalytic converter.
Therefore, spark plugs should be changed as part of a regularly scheduled tune-up.

What needs checking before cold weather arrives summarized in list below

Short of a heated garage, there's no better insurance that your car will start on a frigid morning than a properly serviced engine.

Since warm garages are at a premium, the best way to avoid a frustrating wait for a tow truck is to get your car in proper shape before cold weather sets in. The service needed is far less expensive than heating that garage.

Most cars with starting troubles begin winter with worn spark plugs and defective ignition systems. The incidence of hard-starting complaints reported by car owners climbs in direct proportion to the number of miles the plugs have been in service.

To make sure your car doesn't show up on the list of "won't starts" this winter, here's a check list of the items which should be inspected on your car before the weather turns cold:

Have these checks made...

- 1. Battery . . . Have your service man check the battery with a hydrometer to determine the specific gravity. If specific gravity readings are low, have the battery recharged and make sure he determines the reason for the low readings. If battery condition appears doubtful have the mechanic test it for weak cells. Also, be sure he removes all corrosion from the battery terminals and lubricates them so the corrosion won't reoccur. Remember corroded cables and terminals restrict the flow of electricity through the entire system, and can actually prevent the car from starting if allowed to go unattended.
- 2. Voltage regulator . . . Make sure the regulator is properly adjusted. An out-of-adjustment regulator may not allow the battery to charge enough, or may result in overcharging which will eventually ruin the battery.

3. Starter and generator . . . Chances are if your car is only a year or two old, these components will be okay. However, make sure your service man removes any corrosion that might exist on either starter or generator connections — and that they are all securely fastened. If your car is over two years old better have the generator brushes and commutator looked at. Badly worn brushes reduce the generator efficiency and can result in a constantly weak battery.

4. Distributor . . . If your car has been driven more than 10,000 miles since the distributor has been serviced you'll probably save yourself a lot of trouble by having the mechanic install new points, condenser (in engines that use them) and making whatever adjustments are necessary. Improperly operating distributors are a major cause of starting difficulty.

5. Coil . . . Again, if your car is reasonably new, chances are you won't have to worry about coil condition. However, better keep in mind that a weak coil can not only cause starting failure but also contribute to poor performance in general and reduced gasoline economy. If your car has over 20,000 miles on the odometer better have your service man run a check on coil condition.

6. Spark plugs . . . If the plugs are nearing the 10,000-mile mark, they should be replaced before the weather turns cold as worn out plugs are probably the biggest single factor in hard starting.

It is also a good idea to have your mechanic check the engine with a timing light.
