With the season of college applications coming to a close, for many high school seniors, and a long period of waiting now facing them, many candidates for college admissions sit and ponder as to their chances of acceptance into the college of their choice.

Panic, worry, and anxiety are only a few of the emotions felt during this wait. Grades and college boards are a big worry. But maybe, just once in the academic world, marks are not everything. Ambition and hard work constitute the makings of a respectable mark in this world.

Too often the college-bound high school student thinks that if his marks are low, he will never gain acceptance to college.

Colleges seek the student with ambition, diligence, and perseverance, as well as high marks. Extracurricular activities are a significant part of the high school record. Of course, an excellent academic record is important, but straight A's alone are not too impressive. If a student is truly intelligent, talented, and gifted, he should be able to perform effectively in both academics and extracurricular activities.

For the most part, colleges look for the well-rounded individual and the admissions office can determine that person only by examining the applicant's extracurricular activities and his recommendations.

Another important but sometimes overemphasized subject is the college board. These are required for admission to many colleges. Yet, really, how important are they? Character, ambition, and perseverance cannot be determined by four hours of examinations.

Recommendations are in some ways more accurate than college boards. They tell about the student's character.

These comments are meant in no way to put down the straight academic student and the student who scores high on college boards. These achievements are commendable and are not reached without hard work and hours of study.

But the student who chooses to participate in extra-curricular activities and who is not able to achieve the straight A average through hard work and hours of study is worthy of equal consideration.
