munity of the content and implications of Church teaching on economic justice, we call for the establishment in the Catholic community at the earliest possible moment of a commission on employment and fair income, with voluntary representation from each diocese and from national organizations dealing with social issues.

Recommendation Three — Responsibility in the World of Work

1. That the Catholic community recognize the rights of its employes in the Church or Church-related institutions to form unions and other appropriate organizations of their own choosing to represent their collective interests and concerns.

2. That Catholics encourage and assist unemployed and unorganized workers, regardless of immigrant status, to join or form unions to represent their common interest and support legislation which encourages such organization.

3. That the social doctrine of Pope John XXIII, Vatican II and the American bishops be taught and disseminated at parish and neighborhood levels.

4. That the Church should encourage efforts at labor management cooperation including research and experimentation on profit sharing, ownership of capital by employes and participative management in business and industry.

5. That, since the tragic state of agricultural workers is recognized as a national problem, the sympathy and constructive strengths of the Church be marshaled to help reform working conditions and assist farm workers to help themselves.

Recommendation Four — Apostolate and Working Life

1. That this assembly recognize and support the work of those already engaged in a direct apostolate to working people, and that dioceses establish centers to assist and support lay people in unions, professional groups, farmers associations and business organizations.

2. That Catholic educational programs incorporate vocational and career preparation, career counselling and evaluation, and attempt to identify and make available new career choices for those dissatisfied with their work.

3. That Catholic scholars, especially theologians and social scientists, utilize the resources of the Catholic tradition to develop a theology of work, critique and evaluate economic life, and define alternatives to our present system of economic organization.

4. That the USCC continue to support the work of the National Catholic Rural Life Conference and establish similar offices to maintain liaison with the labor movement and with professional societies.
