Dear Father,

have been reading your columns for many months, and find them interesting but puzzling at the same time. I receive the Courier-Journal as a gift from some friends [sisters], who are in the great hope that I will come into your church.

I am a Zen Buddhist, and I find the Zen Journals much more stimulating, and containing no controversy — Zen Buddhists do not argue.

My point, Father, is that I have included this note with a ZenOGram, something I print each month, and am about to continue again this Fall: I send out hundreds to young boys and girls throughout the country, from Maine to California and Hawaii.

Zen has great meaning for me, and like some of the Roshis both here and on the West coast [I am not a Roshi!] we receive Holy Communion occasionally.

I'm happy this way. You better not print this — you can if you want — but it might not be understood by many Catholics. There is enough controversy in the church now. How did you get into this, by the way? This controversy, I mean. The answer Zen masters give when people start to argue is "Have a cup. Dear G.P.M.,

First of all I want you to know that I respect your conscience and your right to follow it. I do find several things in your letter, however, somewhat difficult to understand.

The first is the question of receiving Holy Communion oceasionally. I would have to assume that if you are a true Zen Buddhistand not merely a follower of Zen methods that you would not believe in the presence of Jesus Christ in Holy Communion I therefore wonder why you would receive Communion if you do not believe in that presence. Perhaps you do believe in the divinity of Jesus Christ and in His presence in the Eucharist but only follow Zen for its methodology.

The second thing that is puzzling to me is your attitude toward controversy. Controversy, is basically a kind of communication. It means that the thoughts of one Individual human being are placed over and against that of another human being. In controversy there is not necessarily any element of anger or fighting or hatred. If these things come about because of disagreement then communication is lost and there is also the loss of humanity: However I do not understand how we can share anything in this world if we don't expect sometimes to disagree with one another. It sounds to me as though what you basically want is to be left alone and not have your peace disturbed in any way shape or manner. In other words may I ask this question: Do you prize peacefulness above the value of seeking truth?

Your ZenOGram was very interesting (this particular one was on the subject of silence) but the exact same material and approach to silence as a value can be found in many Catholic books, particularly those written by Father Henri
